More Awards Won By Otto Holle

The number of winners at the Indiana State Fair which were awarded to Adams county is now known to total at least 19 with the announcement of Otto Holle, prominent Root township farmer, was awarded two firsts and a second for his Chester White pigs and additions to the three ribbons which were announced Saturday.

Mr. Holle's Chester White hog was named champion of the breed in a field entered by the best breeders in the country. There was just one mark higher from this hog and that was to have been named grand champion of the show.

A Chester White barrow, entered by Mr. Holle received a blue ribbon and another was named second.

Other hogs entered by Mr. Holle won fourth in futurity boar class; fourth in futurity junior geld; and third place on a group of four Chester White pigs.

CAROLINE by RUTH DEWEY GROVES

CHAPTER XXIX

The jigsaw puzzle was not all put together that night; Caroline completed it the next day, and was glad that Malcolm was with her when she saw the full picture. It was, she believed, part of a dream that he had woken about her—a dream as old as life itself. As she looked at the picture—a beautiful little cottage, an exquisite and perfect in architectural detail as any mansion she lost even the echo of doubt that Malcolm loved her. Lovely as the house was, he would hardly wish to own it unless he found the girl he wanted to be its mistress. It was going to be harder than ever to tell him now that someday she was going to marry Howard.

Howard brought her flowers again that afternoon and she saw in them a way to reveal the truth gradually to Malcolm. In the evening Malcolm came with a library book she had asked him to get for her. He saw Howard's flowers in a bowl on the table near the davenport. But this time he did not exclaim about them. His face, when he turned to Caroline, showed that he had been surprised. A slightly blank look remained upon it until he took his departure. Their conversation had been dull by a hint of restraint between them. Caroline did not speak of the flowers, either.

Howard continued to bring flowers, and other gifts. After the first few days the neighbors were mentioning Caroline's visitors to each other. Mrs. Stuart saw Howard's car at the curb before the Rutledge house every afternoon for nearly a week before she spoke of it to Malcolm. And even then she did not tell him of the books and magazines, the baskets of fruit and many boxes he brought.

For a long time she had been troubled about her son and the girl next door. Her intelligence had accepted the fact that however poor the Rutledges might be there was still a difference between their station and Malcolm's. They had family distinction in the past at least, while she couldn't think of an outstanding member of her family or her husband's. Malcolm's father had been a fine man—a good worker and honest, but it might be that Caroline Rutledge would look higher than his son when it came to choosing a husband.

Certainly she knew that Caroline was not encouraging Malcolm. She couldn't understand how Caroline could help loving him and wanting him, unless it were a snobishness she had never shown that was holding her back. They did their best, she admitted—Alva Rutledge and her daughter—to be easy and natural with her. She had been amazed at the change in the mother, but she sensed a subtle difference in her relations with Mrs. Rutledge and the other women in the neighborhood.

She feared that Malcolm was eating his heart out over a hopeless love. She watched him like a hawk, and it was not long after Howard began calling on Caroline that she saw signs of unhappiness in his face.

It was she who first voiced the matter. She did not know Howard's name; she had never been in the Rutledge house when he came and Caroline had not had to introduce her. There were still many ill of the typhoid in South Town and she was unfeeling of her services; but she did know that this strange young man whom she took to be her son's rival, was very good looking and apparently wealthy.

"How is she looking," Miss Rutledge? she asked Malcolm one evening when he returned from seeing Caroline. "I haven't been over there today."

"Better," he said shortly.

"H'm, I don't wonder. She's having a lot of company these days. There's some young man comes to see her every afternoon—but may be she's told you."

"No, she hasn't."

Mrs. Stuart sighed and shook her head. "I don't think she's the kind to be hiding anything," she remarked.

"Why should she hide anything from me? I'm nothing more than a friend. The place looks like a flower shop," he added crossly.

"Hothouse flower, and we've a yardful of asters and chrysanthemums," Mrs. Stuart said. "Do you think money makes a lot of difference to her, Malcolm?"

"No," he said loyally, "but it's natural enough that she should have friends with money. You know she cut them all out when she moved here, but being sick—well, it gives this fellow a chance."

"It looks to me like he's making the most of it," Mrs. Stuart averred. "That girl is no trifling Sissy Codden, Malcolm. Probability is, she's as serious about him," she added gently, hating to hurt him but wanting to make certain that he was aware of what might happen.

"Yes," he said dully, "she probably is."

There was silence for a moment, breath sharply. "I want to talk to you, Malcolm. Let's get in the car—father left it as he promised—and go away, anywhere, for a little while. There's something I want to tell you myself, something you've got to understand," she added almost fiercely.

"All right, I'm ready." His voice was controlled, his manner suddenly a cool crust over a volcano. He wanted to help her.

She went into the house and got a wrap and a fez. They were gone in a minute. Mrs. Rutledge, staring after the vanishing car, fervently wished they would stay away until Howard had come and gone.

"Where do you want to go?" Malcolm asked.

"Down to the river. And no talk until we get there."

They found a pebbly place at the water's edge, clean and sun-washed. A dry, smooth-as-satin old gray log afforded them a seat. Behind them the river poplars whispered a minor gossip with their falling leaves. The water was noisier—rushing away from the coming winter, Caroline thought. She shivered slightly.

"Not cold?" Malcolm asked in alarm.

"I was thinking of winter," she told him. "I've always liked it before, but . . . it was always cozy and cheerful at Hawthorn House. Breakfast before a fire in my room—a lazy hour with no mad scrambling to be off to anything, unless I chose. I don't think it's going to be pleasant getting up with the dawn in the winter—on Edge Street."

(To Be Continued)

"I'd be a dog in the manger not to hope you've found your happiness at last," Malcolm said.
