GIRL IN THE FAMILY

BY BEATRICE BURTON

CHAPTER XXXV

Lutie's voice broke in upon her thoughts. "Susan, someone's at the back door."

"I'll see who it is."

Through the pane of glass set in the back door she could see Anna's face as she crossed the kitchen. Anna was smiling broadly at her, but above her wide mouth her eyes were filled with anxiety and sympathy. Where other people might have sent flowers or a note of condolence Anna had brought the coffee cake on a green glass cake-cooler carefully wrapped in waxed paper.

She set it on the kitchen table and then peered her gray cotton gloves from her hands to show Susan the ring that she wore, a narrow white gold wedding ring engraved with tiny orange blossoms. "Herbst married me on Tuesday," she explained. "We was married in the justice's office downtown. How you like my suit? In it I was married."

"Married in green, you'll live like a queen. That's what they say, you know, Anna."

Anna's big laugh filled the kitchen. "Ach, you should see me, how I live like a queen already!" she cried. "All day I run the creamery across the street from Herbst's house, and help Herbst and his brother clean the milk cans. It's the best I ever did."

"On Friday morning Aunt Edna telephoned to the neighborhood photographer and asked him to take a photograph of the house while the curtains were still at the windows and the chimney still flinging its thin plume of furnace smoke into the air—while it still looked 'lived in,'" she said.

Susan heard her tell the man to send the photograph to her in care of a tourist's club in a Florida golf town called Clearwater. "We're going there for the winter," she said to him in a proud globe-trotter sort of voice. "We've been to Europe twice, and we did consider California this year but Florida's so easy to get to, isn't it?"

Susan smiled at herself as she listened. She could imagine Lutie and Aunt Edna showing the picture to other women wintering down south, hoping to impress them with and to probably succeeding. No matter to what second rate hotel or boarding house they went they would undoubtedly set it up on their dresser, carrying with them always the glory of the Brodericks!

Early Friday afternoon the telephone service in the house was cut off. Not until then did Susan really give up hope that Allen would call her up. For days every time the telephone had rung she had waited with every nerve in her body tense for Aunt Edna or Lutie to call. "It's someone for you, Susan."

At five o'clock she went upstairs, put on her hat and coat and came downstairs to tell Lutie and Aunt Edna that she was going out for a breath of air. She had been indoors all week and she fairly ached to get out into the crisp winter air and get some exercise. At the back of her mind was the thought that she might run over to the Cullens' for a minute or two. She missed them, and she might see Allen.

"I may stop in at the Cullens' for a minute," she said, and Aunt Edna merely nodded. It was the first time in history that she did not raise some kind of objection to Susan's going there. Usually she had said, "What on earth do you always want to be going there for, Susan?" or "They're good plain people and they are your relatives, of course, but they're in an entirely different walk of life."

Now she had nothing to say. If Susan preferred common people like the Cullens to people like Wallace Steffen, why, it was nobody's business but her own. That was Aunt Edna's attitude. As for herself, she was going with Lutie to some old ladies' Paradise in a sunny climate where the two of them would doubtless find plenty of bridge players to help them pass the time away, the time that had always crept like a snail in the back parlor of the old house.

"Try to be back at six," she said sharply. She liked her meals, and she liked them on time or a little ahead of time. "I notice you've taken your mother's picture down from the wall, Susan. You needn't have done that. If you'd asked for it, I'd have given it to you." Her chin quivered as if Susan had hurt her feelings. They seemed to be much more sensitive than the rest of her face, as if they had a separate life of their own.

"I was afraid my father would get the picture, and I didn't want it in Mrs. Hopper's house," Susan said bluntly. She had taken it down from the wall and put it in the bottom of her trunk that morning, thinking that neither of her aunts would notice or care what had become of it.

It was dark when she reached the Cullens' and somewhere along the street was the appetizing odor of ham frying. But the white house was dark from cellar to attic and when Susan rang the doorbell there was no answer. Only the sound of the bell itself as it buzzed in the kitchen.

She went on down the street to Uncle Arthur's store. Sometimes Aunt Nell slipped out to get some forgotten item for a meal from the store, and she was probably there now taking down a jar or bottle from a shelf or asking Mr. Jennings, the butcher, to wrap up eight veal cutlets for her and to please be quick about it.

But when Susan entered the store no one was in it but Mr. Jennings himself, sitting behind the delicatessen counter, reading the evening paper.

"Mr. Cullen's been gone since four o'clock," he told Susan. "He and Mrs. Cullen went down to the commission house to see some pink grapefruit that had just come in down there. Shaddock, it's called. He coked an eye at the clock. 'They ought to be home soon. Been gone nearly two hours.'"

He leaned forward in his chair and picked an apple from a crate that stood on the floor near him. "How about a nice apple?" he asked, and held it out to her. "Don't you want to sit down and wait?"

"No, thanks. But will you please tell them I was here?"

Susan was only a few yards from the store when a street car stopped at the corner to drop two of its passengers. A slender girl in a red hat and fur coat and a tall broad shouldered young man who seemed to tower above her as they started up the street side by side.
