and decided he knew her, came as the first big defense surprise. Previously the garrulous old gentleman better known as Jafsie, admitted he had told all manner of fantastic tales regarding the Lindbergh kidnapping to "outsiders."

Under the roaring cross-examination of Edward J. Reilly, chief defender of Bruno Richard Hauptmann, he declared he could not recall having said that he "knew" the baby's body was "brought back" to the spot where it was found 73 days after the kidnapping. But he admitted he "might" have.

The picture the astute defense was trying to give the jury was that of a talkative man who has told many contradictory stories to all who would listen.

At the noon recess Bruno Hauptmann's vigorous counsel had not succeeded in breaking down any essentials of his melodramatic story, but it had succeeded in showing a conflict in Jafsie's stories as told to the prosecution and to friends.

"Jafsie" at Trial

The first attack on the state's theory that the child was killed "instantly" during the abduction, and that his body lay in a hastily scraped grave in the Sourlands from the night of March 1, 1932, until it was discovered, 73 days later, came when Reilly demanded to know whether Jafsie had ever told a newspaper man that the body had been "brought back" to the spot.

Jafsie admitted he might have made some such remark.

At the time the body was discovered, it was remarked that telephone linemen had passed within a few feet of the "grave" while laying their cables, only a few days previously.

Thousands of persons had tramped over the muddy Sourland hills searching for traces of the baby. State troopers and New Jersey police, the constabulary and hordes of newspapermen had ploughed their way over the hills. Yet none of them had come upon the grave.

It remained for a negro truck driver, who wandered by chance into the bushes, to make the electrifying discovery.

Attorney General David T. Wilentz said at the noon recess that he did not regard Jafsie's story, as told on the stand, broken down in any essential.

"There were many theories regarding the kidnapping," he said, "and nearly every major figure connected with the investigation developed, at one time or another, his own theory. Dr. Condon undoubtedly told many persons his own beliefs, but they are beliefs which are since proved to be wrong."

He indicated that as soon as he put Dr. Condon under a re-direct examination, he would clear up all doubtful points raised by the defense.

Van Meter."

O'Leary, who turned government witness talked earnestly to the middle-aged jurors.

He described how he, acting as go-between for Piquett and Dillinger, arranged for plastic surgery operations which provided Dillinger and Van Meter with "new faces."

"Nelson laughed and joked about what he called their 'new mugs' but said he'd go along with his own face a while longer," O'Leary testified.

The young investigator, during the course of his testimony, pointed dramatically to Piquett and said he was present when Dillinger handed over $10,000-$33,000 on one occasion and $7,000 on another—to the lawyer. He quoted Nelson as saying: "I've got more faith in a good old Tommy gun than I have in a new face."

Dillinger's scorn for his personal safety and his mockery of the "shoot to kill" orders that had been broadcast to law enforcement agencies throughout the nation "almost drove his friends crazy," O'Leary testified.

"While he was recovering from the plastic surgery operation at the home of James Probasco on North Crawford avenue he insisted on going out in the evenings and walking around the block," O'Leary said.

"We were sure he would be shot down."

Dillinger's laughing remark to the others was:

"I've got a lot of time left yet."

As O'Leary neared the end of his direct testimony under the guidance of J. Albert Woll youthful assistant attorney general, Piquett turned over to newspaper men and whispered hoarsely:

"I'm going to cross-examine this guy myself; then watch the fire works."

O'Leary, corroborating the statements of Dr. William Loesser and operations on the faces of Dillinger and Van Meter, said Piquett visited the Probasco home several times to collect money.

"Dillinger paid him $3,000 on May 27, the day before the first operation, and $7,000 on June 3, the day before the other two operations, one a make-over job on Dillinger and a new face for Van Meter," O'Leary testified. "I saw him take the money."

CHURCH REVIVALS

The revival meetings are progressing at the Union Chapel United Brethren church where Evangelist R. C. Haycock spoke Wednesday evening on the subject, "Doubt of Preachers." He gave definite proof that there is a God, Hell, Heaven, Angels and a Judge-ment Day.

Thursday evening four souls accepted Christ, making a total of five conversions. A wonderful spiritual uplift was experienced by all present. The subject for Thursday night is "The Drama of Life." This is young peoples night. Come worship with us.
