KKK Robes In Demand For Long Underwear

Tulokoma, Tenn., (UP)—Demands from all over the nation have been received from persons desiring discarded Ku Klux Klan robes as souvenirs.

One of the latest inquiries came from a woman in Baltimore, a widow, who sent a receipt for dues issued to her husband. The writer wanted several of the robes with which to make long underwear.

Other requests came from Hartford, Conn., and a man in Canada. The KKK robes being held in the lodge rooms of a fraternal organization here to restore charges, were advertised for sale recently at 50 cents each. The wardrobe still contains about 75 outfits, held since the Klan disbanded about eight years ago.

"THE COLD FINGER CURSE"
by EDWIN DIAL TORGERSON

CHAPTER XXVII

"I yield the point," snapped Captain Nobley. "He did not wear gloves."

"All very nice and scientific," growled Inspector McEniry, "but where does this get us, Montigny? It only goes to strengthen your theory—that the chap smeared soot on the bedspread, and used soap and water and then cold cream, trying to get the woman's rings off her fingers. But who did it? Let's have some lights!" he added irritably. "I don't like this blue-black business."

Montigny found the switch and they blazed in the sudden light. "Who did it?" repeated McEniry. "Who did all this?"

"We seem to have been active this afternoon," said Montigny suavely, "in proving who did not do it, Duane, for instance."

The Inspector sported. "Oh, I've crossed that smart codd off my list. He couldn't have tracked around here barefooted and done all these things without leaving prints, and he couldn't have rushed downstairs and appeared, right off, with his hands all made up again for the Zulu dance. I'll give him a swift kick and turn him loose. Who else didn't do it? Merriam? You think that cord business was a plant?"

"Assuredly a plant, Inspector. But planted by whom? Perhaps by Merriam himself?"

McEniry stared. "What would he do that for?"

"By way of working up a case of injured innocence for himself, perhaps. By throwing suspicion upon himself, he could make himself appear the victim of a 'frame-up'—yet the evidence is so obviously a 'plant' that he is only mildly suspected. The jewels of course were not disposed of by means of the cord. On the other hand it appears that the conspiracy more likely was with some one who worked from the house next door—who used the telephone in Thurber's apartment."

"Right you are—dead right! They worked from Thurber's place—and Thurber's our man. It was Thurber's cord, he admits it; he looped the cord on that shutter hook with a slip-knot, working from the roof. He did it to throw suspicion on Merriam—that's my opinion. He went next door while the Zulu dance was going on, put in a call from the hall phone, which he thought might help him for an alibi. He went up to his rooms, smeared collodion on his fingers, called the private telephone number here, sneaked up through his skylight and down to this room—in time to surprise this woman with his ammonia gun and chloroform."

"Would he have had time for all this?"

"Why not? Mrs. Elderbank had come up here twenty or twenty-five minutes previous to the time her body was discovered. But of course he had help—the man who made away with the stones."

"The same man, no doubt," said Montigny mildly, "who left the collodion finger-prints?"

"You mean—" The Inspector's brow was furrowed. "What do you mean?"
