

Youth Held for Double Murder

Leroy Drake

Vula Hayden

Leroy Drake, 19-year-old Long Beach, Cal., youth, is expected to plead temporary insanity against first degree murder charges drawn against him in connection with the death of his aunt and uncle, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Steinhauer. They were poisoned and their bodies placed in a machine which was driven into the river, according to a confession police claim Drake made. Drake's fiancée, Vula Hayden, 21-year-old dietitian, was apparently unmoved by the crime Drake is said to have feared his relatives' reproach at his recent theft of an automobile.

practically dissolved away, the cancers becoming smaller and softer. Next he turned to human patients, patients who had been given up as hopeless. This time the ensol was manufactured by putting bits of human cancer in the test tube and adding the bacillus. The Journal carries the report of 30 of these cases.

Discussing these cases in an editorial, the Journal says, "the first two presented spectacular improvement, most of the others showed good through less striking results, and in some few no benefit was derived. "In justice to Dr. Connell it should be stated that his cases were of the desperate kind, those regarded as beyond the help of surgery or radiation. Consequently, his apparently successful results should be given a higher rating than they might seem to deserve at first sight. Even with a cure which could properly be termed, specific, no doubt many cases of severity and in the late stages would not respond.

"The degree of amelioration which he has obtained is distinctly encouraging and clearly demands that his work be continued."

"CAST INTO EDEN" BY HENRY C. ROWLAND

CHAPTER XXX

"Briefly," said Linda, "you want a man as much like yourself as is humanly possible."

He gave her a quizzical look. "How did you guess?"

"Call it female intuition. You have just described Jerome, Dr. Van Dieman."

"Jerome?"

"Yes, Lieutenant Crain. Ever since we landed on this island I've been playing Eve. But I couldn't make him play up to me as Adam."

"About wanting a man to replace you, while you're in Holland, Jerome can do that. He has all points, Spanish and everything. He was a gentleman by nature and birth and tradition long before they made him an officer and a gentleman by Act of Congress. If he hadn't been, we'd be just another Adam and Eve. But he wouldn't fall for any Garden of Eden because we had nowhere to go from here."

Dr. Van Dieman looked puzzled. "I do not understand. It is natural that you two should have fallen in love, living here so intimately. It is also natural that since you are well bred young people you should have desired to preserve your self-respect. But I do not see what you mean by saying that this young man protected you both from temptation because there was no place for you to go from here."

"The doctor with the candor of the modern girl," Jerome turned down the Garden of Eden idea because we can't marry when we get back where we belong."

"Zo... and why not?"

"Because both our fortunes have stopped being that thing," Linda said. "The good old dividends are washed out. We're both flat. He had resigned his Navy commission last year to start a boat-building business. Now he is a gentleman of leisure. Leisure is all he's got."

"Ach... now I begin to understand. How noble..."

"Gosh, Doctor, don't call it that!" Jerome said disgustedly. "It was just plain common sense."

"You are right, my boy. Just plain common sense. If there is anything more noble than plain common sense you stick to it in face of great temptation, then I have still to find it out."

Dr. Van Dieman's pure English was enriching itself a little under stress of his very human emotion. He stroked his silvery beard. "Now I see it all. Let us go aboard and breakfast. Then we can talk. You have been such good children. You have been much better as Adam and Eve. And now I think maybe I shall be a sort of agent of God."

He seemed to be turning this idea in his mind, as if weighing any possible charge of blasphemy. Then he said: "Why not? In the life of every man he is given some time a chance to find it out."

"All that is any good in any man is that part of him which is a part of God," He nodded to himself. "Which is all the more reason for giving the God that is in us a good time, when it can be done honestly."

"That's the trouble," Linda said.

"Well then, we shall see. I ought to be sailing on the next of our vessels for Rotterdam. All that keeps me is this matter of finding the right man to replace me. I permanently, if he makes good. As I have said it is a case of finding a square peg for a square hole, but not one that fits too snugly for a little play."

"Now put away the wedding dress, my dear, and see what you can find in the way of clothes. . . . no, you may put the wedding dress in a valise you will find there in the closet and bring it with you. It has never been worn. . . . but that is something I am not yet ready to talk about even after forty years. Perhaps you may soon wear it happily, and then I shall tell you. Close the house as you found it and come down to the beach and we shall get under weigh for San Cristobal."

He went out and started back toward the ravine. Jerome and Linda looked after him, then at each other.

"This," said Jerome, "is my idea of a good conduct bonus cashed ahead of time and the discount waived."

"And that," said Linda, looking after the big white figure, radiant in the morning sunlight, "is my idea of God in human form."

The big macaw had fluttered after the Master. Then, as if resenting his departure to leave these aliens on the property, he flew back to its branch. "Well, what in blazes do you want?" it screamed.

"Get a new line, Cocky," Jerome advised. "There's nothing in the hot place you squawk about that interests us in the least. What we want is right here—in heaven."

Ten days later the new Pan-Caribbean Agent General of the Van Dieman Lines sailed to the captain of the smart cabin cruiser:

"You are to set the Senora and myself ashore, Mateo, and return for us in a week. Then we shall go to the port of your sainted namesake and take up our official duties as per order of Doctor Van Dieman."

"But Senor," Mateo protested, "you and the Senora should have at least a cook."

"No, amigo mio, we prefer to be entirely alone. If we bore each other there are always the gorillas."

Mateo crossed himself. "They are not Christians, Senor."

"How do you know, Mateo?" Linda asked. She had not yet changed the wedding dress in which she had gone directly from the church to the yacht, about five hours earlier in the day, at San Cristobal.

"Perhaps they are angels in disguise."

Again the yacht captain crossed himself. "Por Dios, Senora, in that case the disguise at least is good. Still, it is possible. Do they not guard the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil? But such things are not for me to talk about."

Jerome and Linda stepped ashore. The boat shoved off the beach and went back to the smart express-cruiser. She blew three blasts in salute, dipped her colors, and headed for the port of San Mateo.

Jerome picked up a suitcase and started across the beach for the mouth of the ravine. Linda walked beside him. As they entered the cool shaded tunnel of the trees she stopped.

"Wait a moment, Jerry. I can't risk tearing this lovely thing."

"Well, what in blazes do you want?"

"What do you think, Cocky?" Linda cried.

THE END.
