SORORITY STYLE SHOW HELD FRIDAY NIGHT

More than 250 persons attended the Psi Iota Xi sorority style show, bridge and card party at the Decatur Country Club Friday night. The party was clever in detail and included a varied program.

Dr. Fred Patterson acted as master of ceremonies and Raymond Gass announced the manning for the style show. Attractive garments were displayed by local merchants.

Tables for the card games were arranged in the large hall at the clubhouse and decorations included autumn leaves.

From 5 to 10 o'clock bridge and other card games were enjoyed and prizes were awarded to the person having high score at each table. Following the games the door prizes, donated by local merchants, were awarded. The country club conducted a dance in the pavilion following the party.

The following women took part in the style show, modeling clothes furnished by the E. F. Gass store: the Misses Sara Jane Kauffman, Helen Haubold, Mary Margaret Klepper, Corolene Townsend, Patricia Fullenkamp, Cathryn Fritzinger, Mary Jane Fritzinger, Effie Patton, and the Mesdames Alfred Beavers, Harry Knapp and W. J. Bockman. Footwear worn during the modeling was furnished by the Nichols Shoe store.

The men in the style show were Hugh Holthouse, Don Gage, Melvin Collier, Carl Sheets, Dick Sheets and Dick Steele. The clothes were furnished by Holthouse, Schulte and company, and Vance and Linn.

Mrs. Charles Hite headed the general committee in charge of the arrangements and she was assisted by Miss Effie Patton, Mrs. Ben Duke and Mrs. Charles Breiner.

Other committee chairmen were Mrs. Alfred Beavers, soliciting committee; Mrs. William Schroek, prize wrapping committee; Miss Bernice DeVoss, modeling committee; Miss Marjorie DeVoss, bridge arrangements committee; Mrs. Robert Zwick, decorating committee and Mrs. Robert Freer, ticket committee.

"WIFE IN CUSTODY" by BEATRICE LUBITZ

Stella? You bawl her out and she takes it on the girls."

"Since when are you so touchy about the girls, might I ask?"

"Well, they in turn let it off on the customers."

"Stuff and nonsense. Did you see my picture in the World?"

"I sure did. Pretty neat, I'll say."

"She smiled broadly. There was a triumphant gleam in her eyes."

"Ginsberg said they wouldn't use it. A lot she knows. Say, that baby isn't as smart as she likes to think she is. If we ever booted her out I'd like to know who'd ever hand her one hundred and fifty berries a week."

"I bet some competitor would."

"They would like—What are you going to do about Mama?"

"When she talked to her brother, Irene dispensed with much of her culture."

"I bet her fire the chauffeur. I can't be bothered."

"Very well. Then you find her another one. I won't! You'd better talk her out of the idea. I tell you I can't spare the time hiring chauffeurs for her. The bunch of things I interviewed when we got Franz—I thought they'd attack me."

"How do you like my ring?" She held out her long, strong hand. The ring was of silver and from a low, intricately carved setting, there gleamed a delicately veined blue and white stone.

"It's an opal," Irene explained challengingly. "It's been in the family for ages and ages. It's a very precious heirloom." She added tartly, when she saw his doubtful expression.

"It's lovely," he said apologetically. "Funny. I always thought an engagement wasn't legal unless it was sanctified by a diamond solitaire."

"To tell you the truth, Walt, I rather prefer a solitaire myself, but this is really a genuine heirloom."

"It's really beautiful. Congratulations, old girl."

"Don't call me old girl, even in fun. It's bad taste! Aside from being tactless! Well, Walter, my good fellow, I'm in the Social Register—by marriage. Oh, the wedding's going to be in the Terhune apartment. I wanted one of the big hotels but I see Dirk's point. He doesn't like pretentiousness and we can't afford it either. Our family is nothing to show off. And of course a church wedding is out. I was very graceful about having it there. He liked that. Besides the apartment is as big as a bowling alley. My lord, they've lived in it for forty years. Can you imagine living for forty years anywhere? And even though Park Avenue listens swankier than Washington Square, it's wiser not to have it in mama's lair. She'll behave better outside. It's a very nice place, though. I'll be sure and I've simply got to tell Ethel that Eddie is not to wear a flowing tunic, the wet nosed imposter. Artist!" she snorted. "Jerry at least looks presentable."

"How about his English accent?" Walter asked slyly. He seated himself on the edge of her desk. He watched the swift play of emotions over her mobile face. It fascinated him.

She laughed. Her teeth were superb. "Just a little too English. Oh, and Agnes—I've simply got to buy her a dress. She's taken to dressing like a debutante. If I don't sit on her damn fast she'll be stepping out in organdie—and rosebuds! At her age. I suppose that's what comes from marrying a man so much younger than oneself." She shrugged nervously on her desk. "Oh, dear, and Carl!"

"What's the matter with Carl. He's all right."

"He's about as distinguished looking as a grocery clerk."

"My dear girl, you can't be responsible for your sister's husbands."

"No, but we've got to make some sort of show at the wedding. Oh, well, you're distinguished, Walter. You have real savoir-faire. We both got it, lord knows where. Certainly not from papa, the Irish tramp. Do you really suppose mama has some noble ancestors concealed somewhere?" Irene laughed.

"Well, you'll invent them even if she hasn't," he grinned.

"She rose and with unusual demonstrativeness put her arm about her brother. 'You are really stunning. How nice you feel. How nice you smell.' She sniffed him. 'Some day some woman will adore you. But you'll be able to make the best match of all. You've got looks, money, poise and, what's more essential, brains. There's no limit to how far you can go, my dear.'"

"The Rileys have come a long way as it is."

"Yes," she agreed thoughtfully. "They have. But you! Say, do you know who likes you? Consuela Lacrosse. She comes in here with her long cigarette holder tilted at forty-five degrees and she's all eyes for you—all ears to hear about you. The last! But she's got millions and poise."

"So you'll marry me off to a tart, would you?" he parried.

"You know I adore you, Walt. I'll give a whole series of swank affairs as Mrs. Dirk Terhune and I'll introduce you to some of New York's prize fillies. I've great hopes for you, old fellow."

Walter rose stiffly. "Thanks," he said lightly. Then abruptly he steered the conversation into safer channels.

"How much money have the Terhunes?"

Irene sighed restlessly. "That's the rub. The family has enough, I suppose. They're those simple Americans. Real blood and all that."

"He was gassed in the war, wasn't he?"

"A trace. But enough to give him welschmerz. He's planning to devote his life to wiping out tuberculosis."

"I think a man is wise to take on a life-work that satisfies his creative and his idealistic urges."

"Rot!" she countered briskly. Her phone rang. "Hello," she purred in the affected contralto she used for telephone conversations. She dispensed of the call briefly. She hung up and faced him again.

"Oh, I forgot. Parker will be in charge here while I'm gone. We've compromised on Havana, although Europe's too full of painful memories yet. Walter, do you know he wanted to go to some deserted place in the mountains for a honeymoon? My lord, even on a honeymoon I'd die of ennui in a deserted place in the mountains. . . . Well, I'm happy, Walter. I really am. I like Dirk. He's the real thing, and thank God, I've got enough perspicacity to recognize the real thing—brought up on sham, as it were."

"How do you explain us, the family, I mean, to Dirk, Irene?"

"I don't. Dirk is a gentleman. Remind me to thank God for gentlemen! He just takes it for granted that mama is of the Polish nobility! You know she's just impossible enough to pass as an eccentric."
