

Do You Want To Try For A Government Job?

Uncle Sam is the largest employer of help in the U. S. A. In the Departmental Field Competitive Civil Service; in all the vast network of New Agencies not under civil service, in the military and naval services, in the foreign service, your Uncle is constantly in need of the right men and women for the right jobs. Perhaps there is an opportunity for YOU to get the job you want with Uncle Sam. The Daily Democrat's Washington Bureau has just printed a new 24-page bound Booklet on UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT. It tells in A B C language just how one goes about getting a job through civil service examination, by appointment outside the civil service, by enlistment in the military or naval services, by appointment in the foreign service; in the coast guard; appointments as cadets at West Point and Annapolis—the whole story of the opportunities for jobs in government. Wrap up a dime and send for your copy of this Booklet.

"WIFE IN CUSTODY" by BEATRICE LUBITZ

CHAPTER XXI

What did one wear to a dinner at seven o'clock? Did one wear a low cut evening dress or an afternoon dress? Helen had bought a dinner dress but in her present excited state couldn't remember which dress it was.

At last in desperation and trying to conceal her utter terror from Walter, she said she'd call Irene. "Don't be nervous, darling," he counseled, sensing her uneasiness. "One dinner's just like another. The Terhunes are no different than your Tante Freda. Wear that yellow shift and I'll get you some flowers."

"Never mind the flowers, darling," she said hastily. "I'll ask Irene."

"That's a wonderful idea. She'll be so pleased. I bet you two will end up great friends."

Helen gave him a sickly smile as she asked for Mrs. Terhune.

"Irene, this is Helen. Helen Riley, Walter's wife. Irene, would you mind telling me—I mean, Irene, what should I wear to the dinner?"

Did she imagine it or did she hear Irene cackle with merriment?

"Have you a lace or net frock without sleeves and not cut too low in the front?"

"I have a brown net dress, but oh, dear, it has sleeves!"

"No, that won't do. Have you a silver or gold or black dress without sleeves? If not, you must get one at once. A dinner dress. No ruffles or tulle. Simple, severe."

"Yes, I have a silver lace dress. It's got an oval neck but it's got rather a low back."

"No one will look at your back. Wear that. And a single strand of pearls or jade around your neck but no colored beads."

"Oh, no, I don't even own any."

"Very well. Anything else?"

"No, thank you, Irene. Thank you very much," she stammered.

Helen hung up the receiver. Her hands were wet.

"My lord, Helen, you look beautiful!" Walter exclaimed as she came into the living room where he sat with the evening papers. He rose as she came in. "That's a lovely shift. You are simply beautiful!"

Ordinarily Helen would have taken heart. She knew she looked nice. The dress had the same tone values as her hair, and her rounded slimmest set off the gown to perfection. Her wrap had a full silver fur collar that gave her added height and her platinum-colored hair melted into its soft fluff. But Helen even had doubts whether her evening wrap was quite suitable, as several women and all the men turned around to stare at her as they crossed the lobby.

She was actually numb with stage fright as they entered the Terhune apartment. The Terhune's old butler took her wrap and ushered her into a guest bedroom with a connecting bath. Helen had never in her life met a butler face to face and she had no idea why she was shown into a bedroom, but concluded it might be for a final examination of her toilet.

But when she shook hands with old Mrs. Terhune, her stage fright magically vanished. Mrs. Terhune reminded Helen so vividly of her Grandmother Schiller that she uttered a little exclamation of joy and to Irene's amazement the old lady (or did Helen make the move?) kissed her.

"I'm so pleased to meet you," Helen clasped the old hand warmly. "Why, you dear child," the old lady laughed. "You're only a little girl. And already a bride! Dear me, how old are you?"

"Twenty-two," Helen smiled, still holding the wrinkled old hand in hers.

"No, not really. Why, when I was twenty-two I had Ces in the cradle. I must say girls look much younger today."

Cecily behind her mother kissed Helen, too. "Walter, you have my sincere congratulations. She's a darling," Cecily said in her deep voice.

Walter fairly beamed with joy. Having kissed mother and daughter, when she shook hands with Mrs. Terhune, Helen quite naturally and innocently leaned over and to Irene's horror kissed him too. The old man was terribly pleased, and before the dinner was half over he discovered that Helen was interested in the history of acquired title to land—although she had never heard of it before—and he was overjoyed at discovering a new and interested listener.

"You look quite nice," Irene observed, patting Helen's cheek as they sat down at the table.

Walter, seeing the gesture and unable to hear the words, was filled with gratitude toward Irene and of pride in Helen. Even Irene liked her!

Helen found herself between Dirk and Byron Mayhew, a nephew of Mrs. Terhune. Mrs. Mayhew had the loveliest and friendliest eyes Helen had ever seen. She relaxed her tension as Mrs. Mayhew, catch-appalling. Have you ever been abroad, Helen?"

"No, I've never been anywhere."

"Curious. You have a certain quality about you that's European, and mind you, this is a compliment! European women have a quality—a warmth, a femininity that American women with their ambitions of equality and comradeship are fast losing."

Vera Mayhew, overhearing him, exclaimed, "Oh, Dirk, you've not sunk to decrying this freedom!"

"Lord forbid! I was merely saying that—what are you women going to do with all the freedom you're getting, once you get it?"

"Enjoy it, of course," Irene cried.

"I doubt it. I don't think cutting your hair and exposing your shins and ardently acquiring all men's vices will be such fun once women,

Never in her life had Helen met a butler face to face.

ing her eye, winked merrily at her. Dirk said: "You look good enough to eat, Helen."

"Thank you very much," Helen blushed, but for the life of her couldn't think of another thing to say.

She hoped rather desperately that Mr. Mayhew, who was engaged in animated conversation with Irene on his right, wouldn't decide to include her.

How clever Irene was. How biting her wit! She talked politics and finance with the men; in fact, Dirk and much of the talking and, Helen observed, looked a little bored at such odd moments when she wasn't talking.

The dinner, however, was delicious. Helen felt she ought to say something. She turned to Dirk. "The soup is awfully good"—then felt herself blushing furiously at her stupidity.

"It sure is," Dirk agreed heartily. "Mother has a swell cook and she understands cooking herself. You know it always amazes me how little Americans know about cooking. American women, it seems to me, actually think there is something degrading about cooking."

"I think they class it with housework," Helen suggested.

"You're absolutely right! Only in America can food be thrown together as tastelessly as it is. Why, what a Frenchwoman can do with a bone, a few bits of vegetables and scraps of meat is a miracle. And here with the superabundance we have of fresh foods, the results are and men too, for that matter, are used to it."

"What effect do you think it will have then, Dirk?" Vera asked.

Dirk laughed. "I'm no authority on the subject, but I wager in ten years you'll all be damned glad to be feminine again. Even the suffragettes have gone soft on us now that they've got the vote."

"Nonsense, we achieved Prohibition."

Dirk fingered his full wineglass. "So it would seem," he grinned.

In the general discussion in which Helen had taken no part, although she would have liked to, Dirk turned to her to ask: "How are you amusing yourself these warm days, Helen?"

"I'm having a lovely time. I'm discovering New York!"

"It's a grand place. I may not be one hundred per cent American in theory, but I'm one hundred per cent for New York."

"Yes, it is a grand place, Dirk." "New York would be even grander if it weren't for the people, the noise and the big buildings."

"Why, I love the crowds." "Well, I do too, from a distance of about a thousand feet in altitude and twenty miles in space," he grinned.

"I feel that way too sometimes," Helen admitted.

"Are you staying on at the Plaza all summer?"

"I'd love to get a apartment, but I don't know where to find one and Walter's so busy."
