WIFE IN CUSTODY

CHAPTER XXVIII
Helen expected her baby in March. It was a particularly bitter March; a March of constant rain and high wind. She couldn't venture out very often, but she loved the house. Everything in it gave her pleasure. The lamp that she had admired once in a shop and which later came as a wedding gift from Irene and Dirk. The chintz-covered couch, the open bookshelves, the brass fire set; the gleaming silver on the buffet, the deep-seated fire-side chair. She'd move a table, then sit for hours studying the effect.

She sat on the cushioned window seat and looked out of the window at the bleak countryside. How blighted and dead it looked—as if it would never come to life again. The garden, once a dear and cozy retreat, was now as bleak as the barren fields. Brown burlap bags covered the hydrangea bushes and shrubs. The swimming pool was an ugly bare opening in the ground with its exposed pipes and sewer holes. The naked weeping willows shivered and wept in the slanting rain.

She turned from the window seat to contemplate her living room. Anton brought in a basketful of logs and started a fresh fire. Marie in the dining room sang lustily as she laid the table. Helen turned on the lamp and the room sprang into life. The pungent smell of food escaped from the kitchen each time that Marie kicked the door open in her trips between kitchen and dining room.

"Light the fireplace in the dining room, Anton."

"It's pretty warm in here, Mrs. Riley."

"The turn down the heat then. The open fires are so lovely."

"As you say, Mrs. Riley. It does look nice at that, eh?"

As the days grew closer and closer to her confinement, Helen grew more and more uncomfortable. Twice she telephoned Walter.

"I think I'm ready," she quavered. Her heart was packed and Miss Fredericks, the nurse who had been engaged a month in advance, was ready to take her to the hospital. Twice Walter dropped everything and rushed home but each time it was a false alarm.

"I'll cry 'wolf' so often that after a while you won't believe me, Walter," Helen said shamefacedly. He kissed her. He was as nervously expectant as she. "I'd better stay home these next few days to be here in emergency."

Evenings they played three-handed bridge. Miss Fredericks was a card shark. She knew card tricks and all sort of card games. She had a breezy, reassuring manner and it was comforting having her about in her crisp uniform even though, as Helen in bed with Walter giggled later in the evening, "she was an awful bore!"

The approximate date the doctor had named passed and now it was due just any day. On Wednesday there was a flurry of snow and the bleak wind. Helen decided to stay at home with Helen. The day passed agreeably. Helen felt better than she had for days. They played cards and listened to Miss Fredericks' rather frenzied piano playing.

At dinner the phone rang and Anton called Walter.

In the dining room Helen heard him cry out with horror. "Good lord, what!"

She rushed in.

"What is it, Walter?"

"It's Stella. Jerry ran off with one of the girls in the shop. Stella is frantic," he said swiftly. He turned his attention again to the phone.

"Hello, Agnes, what did you say? ... Screaming her head off, eh?"
