CHAPTER XXXII

Naturally, my father's attitude was important to me. He considered the possibility that Bruce was the murderer, very seriously. I could see, and the possibility that he would come to trial as assured. It did seem as if the police would have to go no further to press a complete case against him. By his own words, he had established a motive, fear and anger and infatuation. He had given the immediate cause in Connie's pitiful little note. He admitted that he had no alibi.

The time element had been important from the first. Bruce's unaccounted time that night coincided perfectly with the time of the murder. He was in San Francisco at eight o'clock. Had he taken his car, he could have made the auto ferry for this side of the Bay, then driven to St. Joseph. The trip itself would have taken around fifty minutes. Allowing him time to conceive the idea of murder, to secure his car and a gun, and to drive to the ferry wharf, he would have arrived at Connie's apartment at just about nine-fifteen.

We know the murderer must have left by nine-thirty. Making close connections with the return boats, he would have got back to his hotel between 10:15 and 10:30. All that remained was to check with his garage about the car and with the hotel as to the time of his return.

I concluded that Inspector O'Brien would call it fool-proof. I didn't care much; I felt as Dad did, that Bruce had given Connie a rotten deal. I had had too many blows to take this disillusion very hard. I recalled the Inspector's telling me that all that was physically fine was not perfect.

Love was a strange thing. I wondered if I ever wanted to get mixed up in it after all? It was nice having Dicky to take me around to parties and to claim bakes. Good old romantic Dicky! But falling in love or getting married seemed to lead people, innocent people, into such messes. Take Bruce and Connie and Bernice, for instance. Three unusually attractive people, intelligent and educated, surely one might expect them to know how to find some happiness! Yet one was dead, one was spending a solitary honeymoon in Hawaii, while the third, suspected of killing Connie to marry Bernice, reclined behind jail bars.

Take Mr. and Mrs. Carrington, wealthy, intelligent, too, socially experienced—what was dignified or permanent about their marriage? Broken up for a revived high school romance, for a few high words between two temperamental, contrasted women. The wife stood suspected of murder—the other woman, whatever the outcome, divorce for them was settled upon.

By the second day of this type of thinking, I was well on the way to being a cynic. I just about concluded that if one did not take the veil, one should be safer in this world to choose a career and stick to it. I considered the law, following in my father's footsteps, but that seemed a profession in which women were still handicapped. I thought of nursing, and that appealed to me most. One could help poor struggling humanity there, could retain some of one's ideals and still not get mixed up in this thing called love.

Was that Mr. Perkins' trouble, too? Could that cold, gray fish of a man have loved Connie Sinclair? And how loved he and Mrs. Sardoni know each other that she signed herself "Anna" when she wrote to him? Why the secrecy about their acquaintance?

Although the answers to the first questions were beyond me, I could imagine the answer to the last. Mr.
