"More Money"
by CHARLES GRANT

SYNOPSIS

Young and pretty Cathleen McCarthy, secretary to the wealthy Jasper Ingram, attracts her employer's son, Seward. Realizing the difference in their social positions, Cathleen discourages Seward's attentions, but he is persistent and she finally makes an appointment with him. Marian Alspaugh, frivolous wife of Homer Alspaugh, Ingram's confidential secretary, becomes infatuated with the Marques d'Alhues. Cathleen keeps her appointment with Seward. He had expected to carry on a shallow flirtation, but he soon realizes she has too fine a character for any "cheap."

CHAPTER XIII

"I'll say good night here," the girl said, holding out her hand as she stood on the sidewalk outside the gate. "I'll slip in quietly without waking anyone. I had just this grandest evening, Mr. Ingram. Many, many thanks for it."

The hand she put in his was firm and comradely, nice to hold. Seward would have held it longer, but there was something else to be done. He drew from his breast pocket the little package and held it toward her.

"I got this for you—" he blurted. "Oh!" She took it, surprised but pleased and totally unable to guess the nature of the present. "That's very kind—" She thanked him again, more warmly than before. Seward got back into the car and sat waiting while she went in, and closed the door behind her. Naturally, since it was dark outside, she'd wait to open his present till she got in her room. Her excitement, it was wrapped and unexamined, meant nothing. He was eager to know—it had become unreasonably important to him to know—whether when she knew that he had given her an ornament costing hundreds of dollars, she would keep it.

A part of Seward believed and hoped that she would accept the bracelet. But if she returned it, he realized with a singing in his heart, he would be glad.

Cathleen mounted the stairs with light, carefully silent movements, avoiding the steps that creaked. She gained her own room, closed the door, and switched on the light. She pulled off her hat and dropped it and Seward's package on the bed where she sank down, shaking back her hair.

She closed her eyes to keep the wonders of the evening fresh and living for some moments longer. A lovely tune sang itself in her ears. Her feet tingled and her body felt light remembering the rapturous floating of the dance, to that tune. How nice young Mr. Ingram had been to her, how good-looking he was, how well he danced. He looked so clean and confident. She hoped there was no real danger of his quarrelling with his father. Mr. Ingram must be so proud of him, and so fond of him. It would be easy to be fond of him, with his pleasant ways and his kind, honest eyes and his boyish mouth and the jutting chin of his with its deep cleft below it.

She opened her eyes, saw the small square package and drew it towards her. Unhappily she untied the string, unwrapped the paper. Though she had never before and a gift of jewelry, the box alone suggested precious contents.

Disconcerted, bewildered, she lifted the lid and the cotton below it, revealing blue fire and frosty gleaming. She took out the ornament and examined it. A bracelet! She laid it against her arm. Beautiful!

Beautiful in a jeweler's window or on the arm of a rich girl, gift of a father, a brother, or a fiancé, but as an offering to her, Cathleen McCarthy, it was ugly. From young Mr. Seward Ingram to her, it was an insult!

He had said nothing, looked nothing, done nothing to prepare her for this. What had she done to make him think her the sort of girl who accepts valuable presents from men? Was it, after all, so wrong to have been his guest for one evening?

Then she saw clearly there had been nothing wrong in that, nothing wrong in herself. It was Seward

MAYNARD, Mass. (U.P.)—The rigors of New England winters hold no terrors for 81-year-old Daniel Parmenter. A farmer of rugged Colonial ancestry, he wears no more clothes in mid-winter than on the hottest day of summer. "If I bundled up, I'd catch cold," says this octogenarian.

ard Ingram only who was wrong. Being rich, he thought everybody and everything could be bought. Tomorrow he would get his bracelet back and learn differently, and as far as she was concerned, that would be the end of Seward Ingram.

Cathleen thrust the bracelet back into its box and put the box out of sight in the corner of a bureau drawer. She was too proud to cry. With a strong effort of will she hurried Seward Ingram out of her mind. It had all been a mistake. Rich and poor can not be friends. It was finished. She said her prayers, which composed her a little; and then, because she was young and magnificently healthy and the day behind her had been long and full, in five minutes she was asleep.

She awoke a little late next morning and by the time she'd bathed, she had scarcely fifteen minutes left for dressing and breakfasting.

gas-ring and slid a frying pan over it. Cathleen ate scrambled eggs without bread, because they were nourishing and slid down quickly, while her mother sliced the bacon and put it on.

Mrs. McCarthy was getting a plate from the china cupboard and Cathleen was leaving the kitchen when a blaze of light behind her, a clatter, and a loud hissing made her whirl about. She saw in an instant what had happened. Joe, reaching for the coffee pot had struck the handle of the frying pan, spilling bacon and grease over the gas flame.

The fat, running down, spread the blaze over the whole floor. Mrs. McCarthy screamed and flung ineffectual water while Joe stamped and cursed.

Cathleen, seizing the salt-box, flung out big handfuls. In a few moments, the flames were extinguished but the kitchen was full of thick bluish smoke and a strong stench of burning.

Patrick McCarthy bellowed from above to know if the house was on fire. Mrs. McCarthy ministered to Joe who had been burned by the flying grease and at that instant Cathleen caught sight of the clock.

Fright, excitement, and the dread of being late put all thoughts of Seward's bracelet out of her mind. She was halfway up the stairs to the elevated station before she remembered it, and it was then too late to go back. Anyway it couldn't matter much since Seward seemed to have been to the office and probably it would be best to return the bracelet by mail.

That evening there was no question of overtime, and Cathleen got home early. Without a moment's delay, she went to her bureau and pulled open the drawer into which she had thrust the Tiffany box. It was not there.

Searching frantically, sure it must be hiding under some of her things, she stirred her belongings into wild confusion. She had not dreamed the ugly occurrence of the night before. The bracelet must be there, unless—

Straightening at last, aghast, she caught sight on the floor, half under the bureau, of the crumpled paper that had been wrapped around the box.
