

Griffith Picks New Leading Lady

D. W. Griffith and bride

Within a week after he had divorced his previous bride, Linda Griffith, who disappeared 25 years ago, David Wark Griffith, 56, famous producer of the silent screen, married Evelyn Marjorie Baldwin, 26, of New York, in Louisville, Ky., where a festive wedding supper, above, followed the nuptials.

COURT HOUSE

Judge Huber M. DeVoss found for the Bank of Berne in the valid and subsisting mortgage lien held by the bank on the real estate of Nicholas Jenney, deceased and ordered the lien transferred to the funds derived from the sale of the real estate in the sum of $7,700 principal, and interest from December 11, 1935. The real estate was ordered sold by the court at a private sale for not less than the full appraised value.

Found for plaintiff

In the attachment suit of Alice Brokaw against Lola P. Brokaw, and others, the defendant, Lola P. Brokaw, called and defaulted. The court heard the evidence and found for the plaintiff in the sum of $170 and judgment that property in the hands of John L. DeVoss be applied on part of amount found due and costs.

Appearance Filed

In the suit of the Old First National Bank and Trust company for collection of a note, foreclosure of mortgage, and appointment of receiver against John W. Preble and others, Lester B. Harper entered special appearance for Metcalf Trustee. Ruled to answer.

Demurrer Overruled

In the foreclosure of mortgage and appointment of receiver suit of William Preese against John Moon, and others, the demurrer to the separate answer of John Moon was overruled. Exception by plaintiff.

Appearance Filed

In the divorce suit of Max Knavel against Edna Knavel, appearance for the defendant was filed by John DeVoss. Ruled to answer.

Ruled to Answer

In the quiet title suit of the Federal Land bank of Louisville against Rachel Glendenning, the court ruled the defendant to answer the amended complaint.

"More Money" by CHARLES GRANT

SYNOPSIS

Young and pretty Cathleen McCarthy, secretary to the wealthy Jasper Ingram, attracts her employer's son, Seward. Realizing the difference in their social positions, Cathleen discourages Seward's attentions, but he is persistent and she finally makes an appointment with him. Marian Alspaugh, frivolous wife of Homer Alspaugh, Ingram's confidential secretary, becomes infatuated with the Marquis d'Alhué. Cathleen keeps her appointment with Seward. He had expected to carry on a shallow flirtation, but he soon realizes she has too fine a character for anything cheap. Seward presents Cathleen with an expensive bracelet which she plans to return, but the gift disappears from her dresser.

CHAPTER XIV

Marian Alspaugh dominated now by her desire to please and dazzle her newest lover, looked with jaundiced eyes at the little car she had driven for two years. Surely it was now not good enough for a marquis. At its maker's nearest salesrooms, she inspected new models. A larger and far more impressive car took her fancy. Its length, its eight cylinders, the dulled gloss of its midnight blue finish and its darling radiator-cap were irresistible, but it was far beyond her means.

It was a shock a little later in the day to meet Dorothy Holbrook driving what appeared to be the identical car she had been admiring. When Marian made an envious reference to it, Dorothy, to her amazement, burst into tears. "We bought the damn thing before Jack took his last cut. It's so far beyond our means, it's just a joke. It was when I went to go to town. It's paid for, thank God, but try and yet your money back on a used car! I wish to heaven we could sell it, and get a little used Chevvie or Ford, for a couple of hundred dollars."

Marian's eyes brightened as she scented a bargain. Dorothy's car was as good as new. And there need to be no red tape about buying it, no necessity for Homer's signature on a legal paper. She could present him with the accomplished fact.

The two women soon came to an agreement. Marian's car, surrendered to Dorothy, would cost as a first payment of three hundred dollars. Beginning, therefore, not this month but the month after, Homer would pay Jack Holbrook a hundred dollars a month until the car was paid for. The matter of interest was ignored. What was interest between friends? The question of insurance was also passed over. Triumphantly, Marian drove the new car home.

If a Marquis was too good for an old car, he was too good for her old clothes and so she made reckless purchases at the stores where she had charge accounts. Unfortunately these were not the shops she would have preferred to patronize, expensive and extreme; if ever she fell in love with a dress, it was sure to be in the most exclusive shop window. One day she pulled up before such a display and stood staring at a creation that might, she thought, have been designed for her. Only inside that frock could she realize to the full her burning dream of dancing with d'Alhué.

They had danced once or twice in crowded restaurants, in street clothes. She had loved that, of course, but it had only tantalized her because the ecstasy of such an experience should have been so much keener.

When Mrs. Ingram issued invitation to the dance she was giving for Millicent Hinesaw, Marian, to her delighted astonishment, was invited. Now she simply had to have the enchanting creation that had fascinated her. The only question now was, had d'Alhué also had an invitation. Learning that he had, she went into the exclusive shop and priced the dress. It was two hundred and fifty dollars, but Marian, dissembling her dismay, insisted on trying it on.

The materials were silver lame and Spanish tile chiffon. There was a clever cut that made the dress fit about waist and hips like a second skin. There was no back; a slanted front mounted to the collar-bones and was held there by a rhinestone fringed neck strap.

The effect was bizarre, but even more becoming than she had expected. Her feminine curves were alluringly emphasized, and there was so much gleam and sparkle about the frock that her lack of jewels to wear with it did not matter.

As Marian had neither two hundred and fifty dollars nor an established credit at the shop, she was obliged, after hurried glancing, to get out of the dress again. But she said to the saleswoman, "I'm sure I shall be back for this dress. I have to talk to my husband about it first. Would it be possible to have the price? It's more than I wanted to pay."

"Oh, no, madam. Why, it's a French model! And it looks marvelously on you. I'm certain madam would enjoy it. I'll try to keep it for you, but of course—unless you'd care to make a deposit."

Marian left twenty-five dollars and that evening began her campaign to get the rest of the money. "Of course you realize, Homer, that I have nothing left to wear to Mrs. Ingram's dance. The rooms will be full of terribly expensive dresses and jewels to put your eye out. I should have something a little extra, don't you think?"

Homer Alspaugh looked harassed. "It's terrible the way expenses are piling up right now, Marian," he complained. "I was glad enough to join the Country Club, but it costs a good deal. Then you had to take over the Holbrook's car. How much do you figure you'll need for a dress?"

"Only two hundred and fifty dollars." On his horrified and indignant gasp she pursued hastily, "I want you to look on it as an investment, darling. It's perfectly true I've never spent half that on an evening dress before. But we're getting into a different crowd now, where the women wear such amounts right along. It's bound to help you in business, to have your wife keep her end up. Most men in your position give their wives jewelry, and, of course, if I had a diamond necklace or a string of pearls, I could wear any old rag and get away with it. I always have thought funny you couldn't get me a necklace, Homer. Even Dorothy Holbrook has one. You needn't look at me like that, I'm not asking you for a pearl necklace. Mercy, I know an ordinary string of Oriental pearls costs at least five thousand dollars! All I'm asking for is a decent little evening dress that I shall wear again and again, and that only costs two fifty!" She made the figure sound like two dollars and fifty cents, by her disdainful utterance.

"You're not going to get it!" Alspaugh declared with the defensive vehemence of panic. Marian changed her tactics, came and sat on the arm of his chair and petted him, talked baby talk to him in melting accents. "Baby wants beautiful dress!" she whimpered pathetically, making tears well into her eyes. Before they slept that night, he had promised her she should have it.

Today d'Alhué was coming to Long Island, and she was to meet him at the station in the new car. She planned to bring him home for lunch, then take him for a long drive, and at tea-time exhibit him at the Country Club.

She had been only twice in the new car, and she felt elated and self-important as she slid behind the wheel, turned on the switch, pushed a button with her finger instead of stepping on a starter. The obvious newness of the car, the expensive look of the interior, with its distinguished upholstery and many gadgets, the imposing row of indicators stretching across the dashboard—all these pleased her.

D'Alhué's eyes bulged as he climbed in beside her. He knew fine cars and was not abashed of recent American developments by which the highest quality is attained at medium prices. So, his little dove was actually a very rich little dove. He had suspected this before, but now he accepted it as a fact.

They drove away from the station concourse, through the main street of the pretty little town. Marian had ordered everything rich and elaborate that she could think of for lunch, but it was too early to go straight home. Instead she turned into the shore road and stepped on the gas, anxious to show d'Alhué what the car would do.

She was madly exhilarated by the car's speed and the presence of the man beside her. The concrete and ran between the golf-links and the silver sparkle of the water. The day was just on the verge of being too hot for comfortable driving, but the air here was fresher than inland. Marian's foot in its narrow white buckskin shoe pressed the accelerator closer and closer to the floor.

d'Alhué, breathing deeply of the salt air, laughed with pleasure. Because he believed she expected it, and not because of overwhelming desire on his part, he presently complained. "All this time I have not kissed you a little, so we can greet each other as we are longing to do?—I, at least."

She slowed a little, measuring the road before her; too narrow for turning, and too frequented for a petting halt. There were even regulations forbidding you to park. Suddenly, at the right, a dirt road she hadn't remembered, opened off. Marian was almost abreast of it when she saw it, but with quick decision she spun the wheel. She would run down there a few yards, get well over to one side and forget the world in d'Alhué's arms.

So she planned, but in a flash, the world, the sun, everything slid out of her consciousness. Her turn was too short, the car moving too fast to make it. The front wheels headed straight for a telegraph pole. Screaming, she frantically twisted the wheel, then released it and in panic flattened herself against d'Alhué.

In the fraction of a second before the crash, he wrenched at the door, which opening as the car slid, swiped the pole, spilled out the man and woman. With little of its momentum spent, the car plunged on to complete wreckage.

Before he left home in the morning Alspaugh had given his wife a check depleting by two hundred and fifty dollars a bank balance that already looked a little sick. His life insurance premium was due and there were mortgage interest and amortization payments to be met. Then there were a lot of pressing bills—the Alspaughs hardly ever did better than to pay something on account on their bills for living expenses and for clothes. The boot-legger had to be paid promptly.

In the intervals of his morning's work, Homer jotted down figures on a piece of paper and looked at them sourly. He had been all kinds of a fool to give Marian that two hundred and fifty to throw away on a perfectly unnecessary dress. He ought to have said, no, firmly—but he never had the backbone to say no when she was deliberately seductive in her approach.

The truth was that, eight hundred thirty-three dollars a month was not enough to live on. He was constantly running behind. He must, somehow, make more money. Niggardly fear had kept him out of the opulent stock market of twenty-nine; a fear that he, boasting "prudence" when he bragged of having lost nothing in the crash of pyramided paper fortunes.
