'More Money'

by CHARLES GRANT

SYNOPSIS

Young and pretty Cathleen McCarthy, secretary to the wealthy Jasper Ingram, attracts her employer's son Seward. Realizing the difference in their social positions, Cathleen discourages Seward's attentions, but he is persistent and she finally makes an appointment with him. He presents her with an expensive bracelet which Cathleen plans to return, but the gift disappears from her dresser. Marian Alspaugh, frivolous wife of Homer Alspaugh, Ingram's confidential secretary, becomes acquainted with the Marquess d'Albus, a French nobleman who is attracted to her. She buys a new car to impress the Marquess, and the first time she takes him out in it they have an accident and the car is destroyed. Alspaugh speculates with Ingram's money to try and meet his wife's extravagances. Joe, Cathleen's ne'er-do-well brother, reluctantly accepts paying the bracelet for $300. Joe's new job as collector for Ingram gives him too much leisure.

CHAPTER XVII

As the day wore on, the business of asking poor people for money palled on Joe and the call of the old life sounded insistently in his ears. It was easy to convince himself he already had done a good day's work and late in the afternoon he sought out the place where the gang most frequently assembled. Entering the speakeasy, he sat down and called for a high-ball.

Vergile Butti, boss of the gang, was holding a low-toned conference with a couple of his lieutenants, and he threw Joe a nod of welcome and a curt word. Butti, an unprepossessing individual, had small eyes set close to a flat nose, and an egg-shaped head rising between muscular shoulders. He liked to boast, unnecessarily, that he was hard-boiled. His former girl, Gemma, had once wisecracked about the toughness of his face. That pleased him.

Gemma and all other girls were out of his life now; he married Pia Roselli. And their first baby was a boy, ridiculously like Vergile, and he became such a grateful husband, such a doting father, that there was no crime he would not commit to procure money for his family. Nevertheless, the jilted Gemma still met him on terms of great familiarity, and frequently tossed him genial insults, which he took with grinning good nature. Though she had never been in love with him, she liked to feel that she was in his good graces—a highly commendable ambition in their circle.

Gemma was looked upon now as Joe's girl. He thought she was a good scout, but something of a gold-digger. She always wanted money. She was sitting at a table by herself, when Joe came in and he joined her. She was a little bit ready, a condition that always made her childishly affectionate, and now she rubbed her face against his coat sleeve and stroked his cheek.

She had a black bang down to her eyebrows, a chalk-white face—until the powder was rubbed off, when it became a muddy olive rather orange-smeared lips. When she kissed and hugged in earnest, it was, Joe knew, like bucking a mild discharge of lightning. "Take the lady's order," he said grandly.

Kearney, who had been talking to Butti, came across the room and dropped down beside them.

"Want to sit in a little game?" he suggested.

"Your games are too stiff for me," Joe said, keeping his new leaf turned down hard. "I only came in for a drink. I been working all day. On the up and up, too."

"Oh, yeah?" sneered the other. "Sunday-school line, hey?"

"Aw, cut it, Kearney. It's all right for you and Tony to do what you damn please. You birds are on your own; you can take a chance. I've got my folks to think about, living right here like they do. I got to go straight."

"What they payin' you for this work you're at, sap?"

"Thirty iron men every Friday," said Joe.

"Migod, all of that! Well, everybody to his taste, but you gotta expect a ridin' when the gang gets an earful of this. You making thirty bucks, and working for it! You coulda made four, five hundred just taking a little ride with us and doing like you're told," said Kearney.

"Not me. Once was enough."

"Would you listen to that! Got cold feet from that little bit of shooting, hey? Never touched us neither. Bull was so far behind, his bullet wouldn't a dented one of our tires."

"Cold feet nothing! I ain't afraid of a rod. But there's no percentage in getting bumped off. The swag ain't worth it. Why, hell, I—"

"Where Butti figures a dope like you would be any use to us, I don't know," Kearney mused aloud, cutting in on Joe's defence. "Maybe he thinks you look honest, and you making thirty a week. Now me—"

He pulled out a thick roll of bills

Gemma was looked upon now as Joe's girl.

and flipped it under Joe's nose. "I'll tell Butti what you say. Carmine, his brother, come to town yesterday, and him and Gemma sure hit it off. Pop, like that. You'd never think he was Butti's brother. Just a kid, slick-looking like a movie actor."

"Well, s'long, buddy."

Now was the time to get out, Joe thought, and he signalled to Tony for the check. But Gemma had gone to sleep and leaned against him with her head on his shoulder. You'll have to help me spread this kid out somewhere," he said to Tony.

As they struggled with the girl, Butti rose and came to their assistance. The three carried her into a back room and laid her on a bench with a cushion under her head. She stretched, revealing a pair of shapely legs.

"When she comes to, give her a pick-me-up and let me know," Butti ordered Tony. "I'll be upstairs, with my brother."

Your brother, hey, thought Joe—the brother that took a shine to Gemma. "I guess after all I'll come up for a little while," he said aloud.

You can pass every time, unless you have good cards, he figured. You can stay in a game a long time on a little money that way. He'd stick around; keep an eye on Gemma. That wouldn't mean he was with this bunch in their rackets.

All that day Cathleen worked dictating to her, and she had learned what that nervous concentration meant. At noon Osgood, the banker, called and she was turned out of the private office while the two men were closeted together for an hour. At three, there was a directors' meeting in the big oval board room.

Cathleen was asked to wait in the private office until Ingram returned. She was given meanwhile, some special work to do including verifications from the files in Alspaugh's charge.

As Cathleen went in to get a file she needed, Alspaugh looked up to say, "I guess I'll have to keep you late tonight, Miss McCarthy. All right with you?"

"Why—yes?" she answered, not too eagerly. Then at that instant a wild hone was born in her mind. If Mr. Alspaugh could be persuaded to help her! He had always been friendly. Occasionally a little over-familiar, perhaps, but that, she thought, was merely a mannerism, for he had not really been objectionable on the two previous occasions when he had taken her to dinner.

Evidently he regarded her as a valuable employee. He knew that she was getting forty dollars a week, and that Mr. Ingram was satisfied with her work, so that even if the office staff would have to be cut down, as every one now expected, she almost certainly would be retained.
