"THERE'S MURDER IN THE AIR"
by ROY CHANSLOR

SYNOPSIS

Ruth Tyler, blind daughter of former District Attorney Daniel Tyler, is psychic. She foretells murders at the exact time they are being committed but is powerless to give sufficient information to prevent them. These weird visions come upon Ruth while she plays her violin and always at night. Mr. Tyler seeks the aid of Dr. Jan Karask, celebrated psychiatrist, but the latter must go to Baltimore on another case, so he assigns his young assistant, Nat Benson, to the job, suggesting that Tyler give Nat only Ruth's back-ground and let him find out the details himself. Nat arrives at the old Tyler home on East 79th Street at midnight. He is puzzled when Tyler tries to explain that his daughter is a mental case but is not unbalanced. Suddenly the strains of a violin come in upon their conversation, stopping abruptly. Asking Nat to follow, Tyler rushes to Ruth's room where they find the girl terror-stricken. "It began—as always," she whispered. "And then—it stopped!"

CHAPTER IV

Nat lay awake for a long time, going over the case in his mind. He kept listening, wondering if the music would begin again—and then stop. He was hoping that it would, so that he could see, more definitely, its effect upon the girl. But he heard no sound, and after a time he dropped off and slept.

Winter sunshine streaming through a window awakened him. He rose, stretched, breathed deeply of the brisk morning air. Then he bathed, shaved and dressed leisurely, finding somewhat to his surprise that socks and linen, new and of his correct size, had been laid out for him while he slept.

This mystery was explained when Raines, the butler, arrived to ask him to come downstairs. He had simply come in early in the morning, noted the sizes, and gone out and purchased the necessary things. Now he told Nat. Mr. Tyler and Miss Ruth were awaiting him.

Nat found them in the living-room. Tyler and the girl of the violin. She looked perfectly fresh, unmarked by her experience of the night. The great dark eyes turned toward Nat as he entered. They did not seem like sightless eyes. They were warm and alive in her delicately oval face, which was touched now with healthy color.

When Tyler introduced him, the girl smiled sweetly, and Nat took her outstretched hand, soft like her father's, with the fingers so slender and delicate and long, yet so firm and strong.

"How do you do, Nat?" she asked, in a voice gentle as a caress. "How do you do—Ruth?" he answered.

She held his hand a moment, smiling up into his face. "You are very tall," she said. "Almost as tall as Father. You have a nice voice, too. Father has told me all about you. I am very happy to know you."

Nat suddenly felt a pang of regret for the rôle he must play. But he murmured his sincere pleasure. She sat on the edge of one of the big chairs, her little feet barely touching the floor. Nat thought that never had he seen a human being so exquisite, so spontaneously and naturally charming. His heart warmed to her.

Breakfast was announced. It was served in a sunny room overlooking what, in the spring, would be the garden. They asked him how he liked his room, and when he replied enthusiastically, they both smiled their gratification.

They chatted pleasantly through the meal, Tyler indulging in some fictional reminiscences of Nat's father, and their youth together. This, again, made Nat slightly uncomfortable, although he realized the wisdom of keeping his purpose from the girl. But somehow he did not like the idea of deceiving this lovely creature.

an address before the Indiana university school of administration and economics department.

He commended the "Indiana plan" of taxation because "it protects the weak as well as the strong" and "covers the farmers as well as his neighbor who is in business in the city."

Miesse warned of the tendency after broadening the tax base to bring property rates back to where they were. He deplored the taxpayers' general apathy toward budget hearings and urged that they employ the tax limitation and control laws enacted in their behalf.

Whales Play Off Hawaii
Honolulu.—(UP)—Hundreds of whales again are reported in Hawaiian waters, for almost the first time since whaling vessels invaded this part of the Pacific a century ago. Spouts can now be seen almost daily and never fail to result in a rush of tourists and residents to Koko Point, Diamond Head and Waikiki beach.

white. Her fingers trembled on the strings, then were quiet.

"Murder!" she said, hoarsely.

The two men sat immobile. Nat was fascinated—and chilled.

"I can feel it more and more," the girl went on. "Black hate. . . . A mind churning with hate! Death. . . . Death. . . . Kill Roosevelt!"

She gave a little gasp of horror. "He is going to kill Mr. Roosevelt! He is going to shoot!"

She moaned helplessly.

Unable to restrain himself further, Tyler sprang to his feet.

"Murder!" she said, hoarsely. "Murder!"

"Who, Ruth? Who?" he cried. She shook her head, bewildered, frightened.

"I don't know who—I don't know! But I can feel it—a dark evil thing. He—or is she?—is going to strike!"

The pupils of her great eyes dilated. Nat felt himself powerless to move.

"Ruth!" Tyler cried again loudly.

"Hush," she said. "Hush!"

She waved him back. Tyler stood helplessly, his eyes on her face.

"Now!" she moaned. "Now! Shots! Many of them. . . . Five shots. . . . Mr. Roosevelt is safe! Missed! But others fall—several. . . . A woman—two women—a man—a big man, an important man. Words now! Words! . . . Missed Roosevelt! Glad I got Cermak! Too many people are starving!"

She stopped, suddenly, the violin sinking from her shoulder. Tyler put an arm about her, supporting her. As if released from a spell, Nat jumped to his feet, staring at the radio cabinet against the wall.

"Roosevelt is speaking at Miami Beach!" he cried.

He ran to the radio, turned the dials. A confused roar, then a voice, an excited voice, could be heard, the voice of the radio announcer at the very scene:

"An assassin has just attempted to kill the President-elect! Mr. Roosevelt is unharmed, but Mayor Cermak of Chicago and several others were struck by bullets. The man is being over-powered! A gun is taken from him. He is screaming: 'I kill all Presidents! All the officers! Too many people are starving to death!'"

In her father's arms the girl slowly crumpled. He picked her up, held her inert little form close to his breast. Over the radio the excited voice of the announcer was still pouring out the whole amazing story.
