HOLLYWOOD—The story is told of Zoe Akins, but may be a myth. Anyway, it set off gales of laughter at a gab-fest of writers at M. G. M.

Miss Akins goes the report, called the manager of a certain studio one day in great annoyance. "My dear fellow," she said, "there are more in my room."

"There are what in your room?" he asked. "Mace," she replied. "I can hear them making noises in the wall."

Mystified but desiring to please, the manager sent a man to her office. Whereupon the distinguished playwright repeated her complaint. And sure enough, the repair man heard certain noises apparently coming from the wall.

But when he went into the adjoining office to investigate, he found a crap game in progress. The mysterious noises were the dice being thrown against the wall.

Being a gambling man, he joined the game and was soon cleaned of all he had.

On his way out, he suddenly remembered his mission. So he knocked on Miss Akins' door and stuck his head in.

"No, lady," he said, "Not mace-dice!"

An enterprising news photographer snapped a picture of Grace Bradley and Addison Randall in Hollywood the other day, and now the redheaded actress is busily denying a romance. She is still engaged to Frank Prince, she insists. In fact, when the picture was taken, Prince was saying goodby to Mitchell Leisen, the host at the party. According to Grace, she and Randall only happened to walk out the door together.

Jonathan Hale, the character actor, is realizing one of our suppressed desires. He has a hidden loud speaker on his car and an amplifying system that magnifies his voice 10 times. When a stubborn driver won't move over, a stentorian voice calls: "May I pass please." And as Hale drives by the startled motorist, he salutes: "Thank you."

"THERE'S MURDER IN THE AIR"

by ROY CHANSLOR

SYNOPSIS

Beautiful Ruth Tyler, blind daughter of former District Attorney Daniel Tyler, is psychic and foretells murders, but is powerless to reveal enough information so that the tragedies can be averted. These manifestations occur while Ruth, a talented musician, plays her violin—and always at night. The girl becomes terror-stricken and suddenly this strange power grips her. Her father enlists the aid of Dr. Jan Karase, noted psychiatrist, but as Karase is working on another case, he sends his young assistant, Nat Benson, to study the girl. Nat is introduced to Ruth as the son of her father's college chum, in the city on a visit. One night, when Ruth has a spell, Nat prevents Tyler from trying to soothe her, with the result her vision is keener than ever and she is able to reveal the name of the person marked for death. This time it is Paul Y. Gordon, an international banker. Nat telephones Gordon.

CHAPTER VII

A lean man with a hooked nose sat in the small lodge which guarded the main gate to the Westchester estate of Paul Y. Gordon. He was tilted back comfortably in a chair, his feet resting on a gleaming red-hot stove, but his eyes were open, very much so, and they never left the roadway which shone white in the darkness in front of the gate. Across his knees lay a sawed-off shotgun.

Behind him, brooding over the countryside, the huge house sprawled, a hundred yards back from the road, dark and silent. Inside, secure in the knowledge that trusted armed men guarded every entrance, the master slept alone in his suite on the top floor. Below, in their various chambers, slumbered his household, unaware that any precautions to ensure security were necessary.

Off to the right the lean man heard sounds approaching. He leaned forward. That would be Nelson, probably—Nelson, who made the complete rounds of all the outposts every hour. But he wanted to be certain. The lean man rose, holding the shotgun easily. Yes, it was Nelson.

The squat, tow-headed Swede paused only to pass the time of night and went on, toward the next guard. And the lean man tilted back once more in his chair. Then the telephone rang—not the intercommunicating phone which connected all the house, but the ordinary line. Lazily wondering who could be calling at such an hour, the lean man answered.

In his top-floor retreat, Paul Gordon, always a light sleeper, heard the first tinkle of the phone from the main gate. Wide awake immediately, he seized the receiver, his nerves taut. It was Cooke at the main gate.

"There's a feller on the wire says he's got to speak to you, personal, right away," said Cooke's voice. "Says it's very important."

"What fool is calling at this hour?" demanded Gordon, irritated. "Find out what he wants." There was a low murmur over the wire. Cooke talking into the other phone. Gordon's irritation turned to curiosity. It couldn't be a business matter. His close associates knew his private number. Who could be calling on the regular trunk wire at this ungodly hour?

"Says his name's Benson," said Cooke's voice. "Nat Benson. Says the matter's urgent."

"Benson?" said Gordon. "Never heard of him. Tell him to call my secretary in the morning."

"Says he's calling for Mr. Daniel Tyler," Cooke went on, after a moment. "Tyler that used to be D. A."

"Oh," said Gordon. He knew Tyler by name. Tyler's name to call him in the middle of the night? He grunted impatiently.

"Ask him what he wants," he said. There was another low murmuring, then Cooke's voice, anxious: "This guy says it's a matter of life and death, boss; you better talk to 'im."

"All right," Gordon growled. "Put him on."

In a moment he heard a clear, intense voice on the wire.
