"THERE'S MURDER IN THE AIR!"
by ROY CHANSLOR

CHAPTER XXVIII

Nat shook his head desperately. "Lord," he said, "if the police could only locate Collins!"
Tyler paused, and grinned wearily.

"What then?" he asked.
"They could sweat the truth out of him," said Nat savagely. "Or break him apart!"

Tyler paused and looked at Nat. "Collins doesn't know anything, son," he said. "He's as innocent as you are."

Nat stared at him incredulously. "Keep your shirt on," said Tyler composedly. "I know where he is."

"You—?" Nat began, then stopped, recalling the scene he had witnessed between Tyler, Collins and Nelson.

"But why—?" Nat began.
"To throw suspicion on him," said Tyler calmly. "It seemed to work, too."

He grinned.
"Even you were taken in," he said.

"Well, I'll be—," said Nat.
"That's why I did it, you in on it," said Tyler. "I wanted to see whether I could build up a case against Collins that everybody would swallow."

He laughed. "Pretty sure at me for a while, weren't you, son?"

Nat grinned sheepishly. "I still don't understand what good—" he began.

"It's like this," Tyler said patiently. "When I heard Nelson was going to town, I had a hunch. I talked with Collins and Nelson. Collins was willing to help out. Nelson took him to my own house. Nobody would think of looking for him there. But just to play safe, in case Collins wasn't as innocent as I thought, I phoned Kilrane. Before Collins got to my house, the phones there had been tapped. If he tries to communicate with anybody, that will be that!"

"But suppose he sneaks off?"
"I took care of that too," said Tyler composedly. "If he moves an inch out of that house, there'll be a Central Office man tailing him. He's guilty, he'll lead us right to Gaudin. I don't think he's guilty, though."

"But why all this camouflage?"
"I just want to lull Gaudin's real accomplice into a false sense of security," said Tyler calmly. "He—or she—may overplay his or her hand now."

"But if Collins is innocent, won't the real accomplice know—" Nat began.

"I don't think so," said Tyler. "I think the real accomplice will believe Collins is in on the general plot—and has skipped to draw the dogs off the scent."

It was seven o'clock when Héline's tiny platinum wrist-watch when the door to her windowless room was opened by a slim dark man bearing a tray, covered with a napkin. Through the door she heard the sound of music, gay dance-music, apparently coming from somewhere downstairs.

The man closed the door and grinned at her.

"Hello, sister," he said. "Like to tie on the nose-bag?"

She recognized the man called "Nicky." He eyed her speculatively. She shrank under his bold stare. He grinned and advanced with the tray, threw back the napkin. An appetizing aroma came to her nostrils. Nicky laughed, and set the tray on a chair.

"It's good chow, babe," he said. "We got the best chef in Bronx County. Hop to it."

He waved toward the tray, then took another chair, tilted back comfortably and lighted a cigarette. The girl hungry, but she didn't move. Somehow she couldn't, with those hard eyes fixed upon her.

"Not hungry, eh?" said Nicky. "Please," she said pleadingly. "I—I'd like to be alone."

Nicky's eyes narrowed.
"Don't be like that, baby," he said. "I'm your friend. I might be able to do you a lot of good."

The girl glanced at him sharply. He was grinning. She shuddered. Nicky stood up suddenly. He strode to the couch and looked down at her. Then he sat down again, and surveyed her appraisingly. The door opened. Héline and Nicky turned quickly. The man with the dark mustache, Jim, stood there.

"You, Nick," he said curtly. "Scram!"

Nicky shrugged philosophically and stood up. Jim jerked his thumb over his shoulder imperiously. Nicky went to the door. Jim opened it, waved him out. Then he turned, without a word, and followed.

Héline seized the tray and began to eat. The food was surprisingly good. With it she found a small bottle of Chablis. She looked at the label curiously. It looked like imported wine.

Jim fed Nicky proceeded silently to the front of the long hallway, entered a well-furnished apartment, with large windows. An electric sign blinked just below. The strains of dance-music were loud and clear. Jim glared at Nicky.

"Stay away from her!" he snapped.
"Just taking her some grub," Nicky grumbled.

"Tony'll take care of that," said Jim.
"Kayo," said Nicky resignedly.

He stretched out his legs.
"Got a job for you," said Jim. "Take one of the autos and drive downtown. First edition of the Star's off the presses at ten forty-five. Get one and look for that ad. I don't want to wait till it gets up here. Phone me. Understand?"

Nicky nodded, took a hat from the table and went out. Jim grunted. Then he went down the hallway, stopped in front of Héline's door, listened a moment. He heard nothing. He hesitated, then opened the door. The girl glanced up, worriedly, from her dinner. Jim grinned.

"Just to make sure you didn't have company," he said, and closed the door. He continued down the hallway, passed the second door without pausing and stopped in front of the third, the last of the doors in the hall. He unlocked this door and peered in.

It was exactly like the room where Héline was. Carlotta Gordon sprang to the stairs click. The door he blocked it.

"My lord!" she said. "How long am I to be cooped up in here?"
"Till Papa comes," he said grimly. He pushed her back from the door, closed and locked it, grunted and went on down the hallway to the stairs. He descended, let himself into the small room, heard the door to the stairs click. Then he opened the door which led to the front of the building.

The music swelled up. Jim stood in the doorway a moment. A waiter came forward. Jim nodded curtly, and the waiter showed him to a table at the rear of the room. He sat down and watched the couples elbowing each other on the crowded floor.

In a few moments the same waiter approached, bowed over him and said: "Flatfoot." Jim raised his eyebrows inquiringly. "Flaherty," said the waiter. Jim grinned. "Okay, Tony," he said. "Send him over."

A broad-shouldered man in plain clothes came toward the table. Jim indicated an empty chair, grinned. "The man sat down."

"What's on your mind, Flaherty?" asked Jim good-naturedly.

"Nothing," Flaherty grunted. "Just a routine check-up, Jim."

"The Commissioner just won't give up, will he?" said Jim.

Flaherty shrugged.
"Can't rule him off for tryin'," he said.

"He ought to know I'm not in the racket," said Jim.

"Oh, yeah?" said Flaherty. "Look, I'm kinda thirsty—"

"How about a nice cold bottle of beer?" said Jim hospitably. He paused and grinned. "The real stuff. Three and two. Fast got in three new barrels last night."

Flaherty grunted and shook his head.

"I don't want any of that mangle-cream," he said. "Save it for the cops."

"Sorry," said Jim. "It's all I got. This is a high-class place. We're gettin' a great play these days. I'd be an awful sucker to dish out booze."

"Sure you would," said Flaherty. "Guess I'll be movin' along."

"Tell you what I'll do," said Jim indulgently. "I'll buy a right guy a drink any time."
