in the county, attributed to the discontinuance of the AAA policy. The 1935 records show a total of 3,758 sows and 16,971 other hogs. Last year's sows numbered 3,491 and other hogs, 16,112. This is an increase of 267 sows and 859 other hogs.

County owned poultry dropped in number this year. This year's poultry numbered 13,179,420 and last year's 13,301,020.

In keeping with the trend toward motor powered farm implements, Adams county farmers now own 629 tractors, whereas only 603 were in use last year. The decrease in the number of horses and mules in relation to the increase in tractors and other motor implements affirms this movement.

An exact number of retail stores could not be determined at present as several merchants included their business location in either of two classes. Monroe corporation firms were assessed but not yet included in the report.

The report shows that 211 retail stores were included under that head and 256 firms listed under retail stores, shops, etc., with fixtures. These figures do not include the Monroe corporation.

There are, according to the report, a total of 4,665 households in the county, an increase of 37 over last year. Based on these figures and the number of 4,603 autos, nearly every family would have its own car.

Figures for the city of Decatur reveal that 1,309 households were assessed for 1,053 automobiles. The 1935 census places Decatur population at 5,156, or an auto for every five persons in the city.

The city of Decatur has 11 horses, no mules, 25 milk cows, three other cattle, no sheep, two sows, 12 other hogs, 49 dozen poultry and no tractors.

CHAPTER XIII

Genevieve had wanted to go to the Diplomat, which was absurd, as how could they on one hundred dollars a week?

Diana was through with keeping up a front, through with spending what they had not got. She declined to start this new life on a false basis.

"We'll take a cute little court-bungalow, Genevieve. I've heard you can get two-rooms-and-kitchenette for as low as $30 a month out there. It's fashionable to live modestly in Hollywood."

"Umph! I don't believe it." Genevieve was exhausted after the packing and the departure. Bella had been tired. Bella had been engaged by the new tenants to stay on in the house for their four months' lease, and Genevieve had encouraged her to do so, because that meant her treasures would be well looked after, and reports sent out to her.

"I can't possibly afford to take you on such a trip," Genevieve had told the weeping Italian.

"Close the window, Diana." Genevieve now coughed fretfully.

Diana did as she was told. She looked with compunction at her mother.

Genevieve was so thin. Her cheekbones stood out sharply in her beautiful face.

"The warmer climate will suit you, darling. You look as if a puff of wind would blow you away."

"Dr. Woodhouse said it was best for me to get out of the cold of New York this winter," Genevieve admitted.

Diana looked anxious.

"I was so busy thinking about my silly career that I—"

"Oh, I'm all right, Diana. The main point is that your ankle's in strong again, and you're fit to tackle this big opportunity."

It grew monotonous on the train. Genevieve slept a great deal. Diana read, but the thought of Roger came between her and the printed page. She found herself staring out of the window, thinking and dreaming of him, hour after hour.

The day passed. Two days. Neither of them had talked to any of their fellow passengers. Diana would have liked to break the monotony by meeting someone from the movies, for on this train it was obvious there were plenty of motion-picture people.

Dashing blondes galore, and those not so dashing.

Sleek-haired young men, impeccably dressed, who studied scripts and played poker and contract.

The third day, at luncheon in the dining car, Diana and Genevieve found themselves opposite an odd-looking young man.

He was wearing old gray flannel trousers, a dilapidated sleeveless sweater, and a greasy-looking suede sports jacket in a faded mustard color.

His sweater had obviously shrunk, so that the large bones on his wrists were in evidence as he helped himself to pepper and salt. He was a cheerful-looking youth with an excellent appetite.

"Hollywood bound?" he questioned Diana.

She nodded.

"Movies?"

Another nod.

He grinned. "I thought so." Genevieve regarded him haughtily.

How impertinent he was! In those old clothes, how could he afford to be traveling like this?

"I noticed the old ballyhoo between you and the photographers at Grand Central when we were starting. Such a lot of hokey, isn't it? And the reporters giving the usual 'ea' oil!"

Genevieve flushed angrily, but Diana giggled. For there was something so comical in his small, twinkling eyes—something so friendly, too—that one could not take offense at him. She thought he had a frank kind of face, though no one could have called him good-looking.

Genevieve said icily: "Having made her social debut and now about to make her professional debut, I see nothing strange in the press desiring to have my daughter's pictures in the papers."

"No offense meant, I'm sure," said the young man cheerfully, still grinning. He added: "You'll like Hollywood. It's a swell spot."

"You know it?" asked Diana, wanting to make amends for her mother's snubbing.

"Sure I do. I've a job there." He thrust a large hand through a mop of unruly blond hair, his eyes twinkling at her.

"An actor?"

"Not on your life. But I work at the studios."
