CHAPTER XXIII

One of the worst floods in California's history took place over the New Year week-end.

The train started in Hollywood on Saturday afternoon, but by that time Jerry and his large party were half way to the Mexican border, whirling along the Pacific coastline.

To the right, the ocean was sparkling blue, and saffron hills rose sharply to the left. Further along the winding highway, exquisite Spanish villas were perched in their green gardens that ran to the very edge of the high red cliffs.

"It's like the Biarritz coastline. It sure is pretty," remarked Mrs. Nolan to Genevieve as the pair leaned back in the limousine the devoted Jerry had delegated to them.

Perhaps, in the whole party, these two mothers were the only happy people.

For there had been a mix-up in the important question of: who should go with whom?

Diana had hoped to ride with Roger who, for professional reasons, wanted to travel with Falconer, the director. Falconer, however, wished to be tête-à-tête with Dolores D'Arcourt.

Dolores had her own car and chauffeur with her (supplied by Falconer) but Dolores was tired of the honky-tonk-looking, too-devoted Falconer, and wished to ride along with Roger Dexter. By a ruse, at the last moment she succeeded.

Jerry Nolan particularly wished to be with Diana, but had held back because of the girl's avowed affection for Roger. Jerry was altruistic.

When Dolores rode off alone with Roger, Falconer turned purple with indignation, and registered a vow that because of this "kidnaping," the jackanapes playboy would be "out" forever from the studio!

His rage was lessened a little, however, when he found himself alone in one of Jerry's hired cars with Diana Darling.

He had admired the sweet-faced, gentle-mannered child from New York's "upper-crust." He himself had come from nothing, but cherished a snobbish social ambition.

The Dexter jackanapes was pally with her. To play up to the girl might even be the score!

It would cost spoiled Dolores a lesson. She was serious, in any permanent sense, over a $75-a-week scene painter who had been fired from the studio for drinking and inattention to the job when she had a boy-friend earning $75,000 per picture, as Falconer did—but it would be good to turn the tables on her and make her jealous!

Before this reached San Diego, and ignoring the chauffeur's tell-tale mirror, Falconer had tried to kiss Diana, and been firmly but gently put in his place.

Extraordinary for a $100-a-week novice to dare snub her director! thought Falconer, but it only whetted his appetite for further conquest.

In default of being with the all-important Falconer who could re-estate him at the studio, Roger decided it would be expedient to play up to Falconer's sweetheart, Dolores D'Arcourt. He had never liked Dolores, but "needs must," when one was broke.

During the brief stop at the Immigration and Customs station at the border, Falconer, out of the tail of his eye, beheld Roger openly flirting with his sweetheart.

As they whirled past the towering campfire in the gorgeous grounds of Agua Caliente, and to the various bungalows of the hotel that Jerry had engaged for the week-end, Falconer became more and more determined to pay the pair out—through Diana.

An order of sale of unsold land was vacated. The estate was closed and the ad-

"Sweepstakes on Love"

by MAY CHRISTIE

The semi-tropical twilight was rapidly descending. After a bath, and changing into evening clothes, Falconer repaired to the long bar in the casino, to find it already packed with people.

Roger and Dolores were at a little table in a corner, laughing into each other's eyes over tall glasses of planters' punch.

The Darling child was with her mother in her bungalow. The little iceberg had been tantalizing in the car in her outfit of bright red. Red was a grand color for gambling!

Roulette was his game. He went down the steps from the bar to the roulette table, and flung a hundred-dollar bill on the red point.

He lost!

He tried again—again—again—and yet again, only to lose five hundred dollars. It was a bad omen.

Presently, Jerry arrived, and after further libations, marshaled his party into the big Spanish restaurant for dinner.

Not even the champagne or the splendid floor-show throughout the excellent meal could restore Falconer's good humor.

Roger sat next to Dolores and played up to her. The planters' punches had been potent, and the pair were now oblivious to everybody else.

While the others lingered at the table when the meal was over, sipping liqueurs with their demitasses, and dancing between floor-shows, Falconer started back to the gambling rooms, and through an open archway in the gardens sighted Diana.

Here was his chance! She was going to the bungalow on an errand for her mother. Falconer hastened after her in the darkness under the palms.

He had drunk considerably by now, and he was amorous. He put an arm about her and drew her into him, kissing her hotly.

She wrenched back from him and slapped him in the face.

A half-hour later in the hotel-bungalow, Diana repaired her make-up and dried her eyes.

"I suppose this ends my movie career," she said to herself, her lips still trembling from the mischances of the afternoon and evening.

"Well, anyway, I'm nothing but a mighty poor actress!"

She went back to the lively table in the dining-room, thankful that Falconer was gone.

Roger asked her to dance with him. Mechanically she consented.

Dolores' green eyes followed them, full of annoyance.

"Can things ever be the same again?" thought Diana. There was a sort of tarnish now on her love for Roger.

He stumbled a little as he danced. His eyes looked shifty.

Suddenly, from directly behind them, came a high-pitched male voice she recognized. "Why, of all the jolly old meetings! Just fancy running into you two dear old blighters in jolly old Mexico!"

Diana turned. It was Clarence Thyme.

And not alone. Came a cool, provocative feminine laugh.

"Hello, Roger darling! Hello, there, Diana!"

She was looking into the eyes of Regina Hyslop.

Regina had flown in her four-passenger Curtis to Agua Caliente, all the way from New York, to bring in the New Year.

She had Maude, her stooge, with her, and the impetuous Irish nobleman who had sat at her left at her debut at the Monarch, and the ebullient Englishman, Clarence Thyme, who was convinced
