CHAPTER XXV

"Could I get away for a few days, dad? Possibly a week or two?"

"Where are you going?" surprised.

"Well, I think one of us should give the branch office more personal supervision, particularly New York and Chicago. Nelson in Chicago, you know, hasn't been very regular with his reports, and they're not satisfactory. Thought I might take a run up there and look things over, then on to New York before I come back. Perhaps be gone for two weeks, or so," casually.

The elder executive had grown accustomed to his son's sudden propositions, but they still shocked his torpid methods. He preferred to ponder over new departures, pro and con. But Jack was impatient to act. "Do you think you might accomplish enough to justify the expense?" he queried.

Jack laughed ruefully. "I'd expect to. And besides, I don't think the trip would do me any harm. We need some perspective on the national business element. Down here, we scarcely know what's going on in the rest of the world."

"I prospered when we knew less," cryptically.

"In a different era, yes. Yesterday wasn't today, and today is not tomorrow. We're living faster every minute."

"Yes, and there's a limit even to speed," was the tacit reply. "But you may be right about the inspection of the branch offices. No doubt, you are the one to go, if anyone does. The Colonel or I could not deal with the problem, I fear. I'll speak to him about it."

"Today?" Jack urged impatiently.

"Well—as soon as I see him. But I don't think the matter is so urgent. The branches will function for another week or so until you get there," he remarked quizzically.

But Jack speeded the conference and obtained the Colonel's approval of the northern trip. In jubilant spirits, he announced his departure to Doti. But when he saw the expression of anxiety on her face, he decided it would not be fair to leave her too much with his own anticipation. He felt more than a little confused himself about his sudden desire to find Lynn, and was not at all sure the result would prove satisfactory. He was very gay and tentative to Doti that last evening with her. And he remarked as casually as possible, "By the way, give me your cousin's address so I can look her up to say hello."

"Of course, you must see Lynn. I'll write her a note for you to carry along, too, instead of mailing it. I should have written before this. I've had only one letter from her since she went back. But she must be terribly busy, poor dear. Just imagine anyone as beautiful and sweet as Lynn, earning her own living. She should have some one taking care of her magnificently."

Jack heartily agreed with that, but he did not express himself too vehemently. However, the remark increased his impatience to find Lynn and beg her to accept his protection. He felt a little guilty about Doti who always had seemed such a natural companion for him, but he looked at her now and realized why he had not been more serious in his attentions before. She was a sweet, adorable child, a jolly companion—and just about everything except the girl he loved. He realized that now. He was fond of Doti, always would be—but he did not love her. Her presence certainly did not disturb him even as the mere thought and memory of Lynn did. Doti did not fill him with an initiative urge to go out and seek new worlds to conquer.

The trip north seemed interminable to his impatience. He was exasperated with himself to remember that Lynn had been in his presence almost continually for an entire week, and he had accepted her almost as casually as all the other girls of his acquaintance. And now, a limited train seemed to be creeping over the endless miles toward where she was. He should have flown. Why hadn't he thought of that before? What was the matter with him? He seemed to be doing everything wrong these days. He was a blundering idiot. He would have to develop more business acumen than this if he expected to win and support a wife. What had he been doing with his youth? Why had he squandered so much time and money and effort on frivolities? Thus did he emerge from the chrysalis of quiescent youth into the state of manhood and its profound significance.

Arriving in Chicago in the gray fog of a March morning, he went directly to Dunning's, where Doti had informed him Lynn was working. He scored almost a day's delay in waiting to see her where she lived. If she could not leave her duties, at least he could see her for lunch.

After considerable inquiry, he located Mr. Lowry, who was bland and ingratiating until he learned that Jack was in search of Lynn Bartel. Then he was very curt and aloof.

"Miss Bartel is no longer with us."

"When did she leave, may I ask?" his disappointment was reflected in his face, but his inquiry was eager.

"More than a month ago."

"Do you know where she is, now?"

"I have no idea!" he turned away abruptly.

His manner baffled Jack, who could see no reason whatever for anyone acting so discourteous, but he turned away confidently and with haste.

The only thing for him to do was to go directly to the address where she lived and inquire where he might find her, or wait there for her return in the evening. He took a cab to Mrs. Kime's address.

For Lynn, life had become one day of torture following another. And yet, miserable as she was, she felt so much wiser than ever before in her young life. She knew more about life, about everything. It was as if in her hours of idle thoughtfulness, she stood on a summit, high above the world, and looked down upon its tremendous and petty struggle for existence with a totally new compassion.

She was more tolerant toward everyone in her thought and attitude. She understood now why girls who
