CHAPTER XXVII

They assured Mike that everything was perfect. "It's the most beautiful place in Chicago!" Susanne enthused, for which he bowed adequate appreciation. But his shrewd eyes focused upon Lynn.

"Your taste is improving, Meester Townsend, or your sense of what you call—appreciation? You got lady these times your own father would approve—no? I am surprised at you," his mirth was superfluous.

"Now, Mike, I'm a friend of yours," laughed Jed. "I didn't think you'd be down like that. Don't make the lady think I'm a bouncer."

"Ah, no," Mike denied violently. "I do not betray you—I compliment you—and the lady," he bowed before Lynn. "I hope you also like my place."

"What became of the blonde siren? I missed her when I came in, tonight," said Jed.

"Oh!" Mike's eyes implored heaven and his fat hands clasped above the cardiac regions which were difficult to locate with so much abdomen. "She has the terrible temper. Eef I have not desecrated her, she tear up these place," his hands demonstrated the debacle. "So—she have no charming hostess now!"

"I have found no wan," despairingly. "You gentlemen who have so severe many lady friends can tell me of someone—no?"

"How about Lynn, here?" Susanne suggested quickly. "She's looking for work."

"But no!" gasped Mike.

"Lynn laughed. 'I certainly am, Mr. Perrone. Would I do for your hostess?'"

"Would you do?" his delight overflowed. "You would be perfect! You mean you would consent—to work here?"

"I'd love to!" said Lynn, feeling giddy at the sudden relief which overflooded her at the thought of working again—at anything.

Jed demurred in a low tone. "Sure you'd like it? I don't think he pays much, and it's—well, I don't like to see you—do it."

"It would be better than nothing—until I find something better," her voice exulted and her white face glowed with an enthusiasm she had not felt for weeks. "May I try it, Mr. Perrone?"

His consent was gracious. "Well you then come into my office for work moment? Excuse, please," he begged her companions.

Jed arose and stood aside as she followed the proprietress of the Roman Chariot into his private office at the rear of the large room.

"Eet ees like the geeft from heaven, you are!" Mike exclaimed. "But we pay not so much—I fear—"

Lynn reassured him hastily—too hastily, perhaps. But she was so anxious that this shining hope be snatched from her despairing hands. "Oh, the salary is not so important—that is—"

I realize that you couldn't pay much, perhaps, for such service. But I'd like to try, anxiously.

"Eet ees not so much for your service, you understand, but your beauty, that I pay you. You have nothing to do—only the gracious smile, the greeting of the hostess, the—what you call—atmosphere—that I desire, Meester Bartel."

"I understand. What are the hours?"

"Nine o'clock to three o'clock."

"In the morning? Of course," she laughed at her own stupidity. "Night club do not flourish in the daytime."

"She had not considered that element of the situation, but it would have to be managed somehow."

"And I weel pay you—ten dollars."

It was less than she had expected, but it was ten dollars more than nothing.

"You have also—two meals," he encouraged.

That was one advantage, she reflected, but it was not going to be possible for her to remain at Mrs. Kime's and work at the Roman Chariot. She could not go all that distance alone after three o'clock in the morning.

"I'll take it," said Lynn. "When do I begin?"

"Tomorrow night, you must be here, and always look as beautiful as you are tonight," his flat was disguised as a compliment, but Lynn realized that her poor little salary would be most inadequate for maintaining her appearance in formal gowns, having little variety with which to begin.

Mike escorted her back to her party, very grateful to Jed for bringing Lynn to his attention. Jed was alone at their table; Susanne and her friend were dancing.

"I don't like the idea of your doing work like that," his tone was anxious.

"Why, there's nothing to it," she insisted cheerfully. "Just stand around and look—beautiful, as Mr. Perrone specified."

"You can do that, all right. But do you have to? I mean—you shouldn't have to work."

"Well, I do. Work doesn't hurt anyone. It's the lack of it that's so devastating," she was tense with the fearful contemplation of what continued idleness would bring.

His keen gray eyes held hers soberly for a moment. Then he smiled suddenly and suggested, "Shall we dance?"

The night revealed on. Some of the patrons grew bolder, some were disgruntled. Cal grew loquacious and more affectionate with each stimulant, but Lynn noticed that Jed drank little and was very solicitous for her. She liked him. Added to her exultation over her promise of work to begin on the morrow, it was pleasant to have this new protective friend who had already benefited her much more than he could suspect. She was so glad she had come here, and was grateful to Susanne for bringing her. Her consent had been for Susanne's benefit entirely, and had resolved into her own. Such is the reward of generosity to another.

Jack arrived at Mrs. Kime's in a cold drizzling rain. But he
