Mrs. J. C. Mills visited in Fort Wayne Friday afternoon.

John Didot, Geneva jeweler, who made many friends during a brief residence in Decatur some years ago, was calling on the folk here yesterday.

Mrs. Grace Alwein and son Tom and Miss Elizabeth Peterson will motor to Chicago this evening for a week end visit.

C. L. Ayres writes us that he has just returned to Detroit after a month to find his invitation to the Centennial and expresses regrets that he was unable to join the happy throng.

Ray Blampee went to Fort Wayne last evening and from there expected to motor to Indianapolis today.

The showers have greened up the lawns and the pasture fields and helped a lot.

Miss Helen Daniels, Miss Gertrude Schultz and Gerhardt Schultz are spending the weekend visiting friends and relatives in Canada.
Elmer Schultz who with Mr. and Mrs. B. Schultz and daughter Florence have been spending the week in Canada, will accompany them home.

The president's schedule today called for him to detain sometime this forenoon from his special train and motor to the state capitol where the conference with Berry, state, and federal officials will be held.

At the conclusion of the discussions he will return to the train and proceed to Rapid City, S. D., some years ago the headquarters of President Coolidge when he vaca-tioned in the Black Hills. There he will remain until tomorrow night when he proceeds westward to Salt Lake City to attend funeral services Tuesday for Secretary of War George Dern.

After a day in Salt Lake City his special train will carry him eastward to Des Moines for the conference with Governor Landon of Kansas and the state executives of Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, and Oklahoma on Sept. 3.

CHAPTER XXVIII

"Take me to a good hotel—I don't care which one." He climbed in and slammed the door after him, sank into the seat and stared ahead with a baffled expression. Why had Lynn moved, left the place where she had worked, lost her job? That was it.
She had lost herself. A new thought inspired him. Perhaps even while he had traveled north over those slow, tedious miles, Lynn had communicated with her cousin. He would wire Doti. That was the next best move. And while he awaited a reply, he would locate the branch office of Merchen & Thorpe, and get acquainted.

His relief resolved into action, and he felt better. But only for a few hours. Doti's negligible reply placed him in the same situation of the morning. How did one go about it to locate a certain person in a great city? Vainly, he consulted directories. Only Lynn's recent address mocked him at every turn.

With supreme effort, but always with the thought of Lynn in the back of his mind, he turned his attention to business interests, for which he had invented the trip north. The haste and punctuality of the great northern city fascinated him. Business methods left him a little breathless, and admiring.
When a man agreed to see you at ten o'clock, he was found at the appointed place at ten o'clock and on the day specified; not the next.
When a conference was called for a luncheon meeting, it was adjoined with the lunch—not prolonged through an afternoon of golf and a cocktail hour. The theme of everything was speed. People spoke rapidly, and half turned their backs on their way to another interest. The new tempo amused him at the same time it commanded his admiration. Yet he observed, cannily, that no one seemed to accomplish as much as his associates did in the south. Was it only a pose, or a habit—this terrific haste and tension?

He located some friends; a fraternity brother, a traveling acquaintance, some ex-southern inhabitants. All were delighted to see him and offered to conduct his broader acquaintance in the city. Vaguely, he hoped that he might stumble across Lynn by some chance encounter, but he knew that hope was practically absurd. One little girl lost among four millions!

But it seems always that the least expected is that which happens. It was inevitable that his friends should escort him to the prominent night clubs of the city, and naturally, the Roman Chariot which was one of the most famous and pretentious, would be one in the itinerary.

It was Ollie Barret who suggested getting a party together to go to the Chariot. And he remarked, extolling his merit, "By the way, Mike has a new hostess that would knock your eye out. Man! if you think we haven't some beauties in this town that would give your southern belles a race, you should see this girl. She hasn't been there long, and she won't be either, I'll bet. That girl has greater destinies, what I mean."

From the first moment she entered the Golden Chariot as its hostess, Lynn disliked the place. It was all right to spend a few hours there with pleasant companions at dinner, but to join the varied personnel of so questionable a place was quite another matter. But she literally clenched her teeth behind her gracious smile, and made a brave effort to enter into the spirit of her responsibility. It was easy to see that arriving patrons noticed her and remarked about her, and Mike smiled his flaxen palms together with vast satisfaction. Busi-

"What's she like?" Jack inquired idly, and with a totally detached vision of Lynn in his mind.

Ollie elaborated upon the girl. His description tallied so astonishingly with Jack's own inner vision that he jerked to attention, and when Ollie mentioned the tricky flock of white in her gorgeous black eye-lashes, Jack hurried himself from his chair like a discharged projectile.

"Did you say we were going to that place tomorrow evening?" he demanded. "We're going there this very minute!" and he bolted toward his door.

Ollie looked alarmed. He knew that southern gentlemen were romantic, but that the description of a strange beauty could so affect one of them, was astounding. He wondered what had happened to Jack that he had missed, and feared for his offspring of their hostess of the evening.
He protested to Jack that it would not look so well for them to desert the present provision for their pleasure.

"I can't help that! Tell them I've been stricken with appendicitis—with a fit—anything. Let's get out of here pronto—and to that night club as fast as your speedy old bus can take us."

They arrived at the club in due time, with Jack sitting on the edge of the seat in the speeding car, like a timid old lady on a train ready to leap out at every station for fear of being carried beyond her destination.

He entered the place as if he were a government official directing a raid, and looked about the room anxiously. Ollie looked, a. i. o. "I don't see her," he said. "Perhaps she's somewhere about. Let's sit down."

He led the way to a table, following a solicitous waiter.

Jack obeyed rigidly, his dark eyes roving about the crowded room with alert anxiety. He felt as if he might do something quite absurd if he actually did see Lynn, after all these wretched days of looking and waiting for her.

Ollie urged him to order a drink while they waited. Jack declined to glance at the menu, said sharply to the hovering waiter, "A lime rickey!"

His impatience became so obvious that Ollie suggested, "I'll get Mike Perrone, and ask about her. She's probably around. Maybe out for a few minutes. I know Mike, and he'll tell us where to find her."

He summoned the waiter and inquired for Mike, who, they were duly assured, would be with them very presently.

From the first moment she en-
gether with vast satisfaction. Business came first, of course, but there might be second considerations, also.

Interested eyes of regular and transient guests followed Lynn's stunning figure as she moved among the tables, greeted arrivals, singled out guests for special consideration. The waiters were deferential in receiving her instructions which they knew were for mere surface display, and admired her also. They did not resent her commands as they had done with the tempestuous blonde who had preceded Lynn.

Lynn despised the prolonged hours of hilarity, and their nightly repetition. She was living in a mean little room nearby, to which she escaped with grateful relief every early morning, only to loathe its cheap and tawdry atmosphere the moment she entered it. But she had to live. At least, she had to advance this effort to exist, until she could live again. She wondered if ever she would return to her old life, recalling how she had dreamed of lifting herself out of the drab routine of working at Dunning-ing's and living at Mrs. Kime's, she now marvelled at her utter lack of appreciation. Compared with this, it had been sumptuous living.

She had not moved all her things with her. Mrs. Kime had insisted that she would return there, soon, and was welcome to leave anything she wished. It was only a temporary absence, she had reassured Lynn, who felt as if she were truly leaving home for a hazardous adventure.

So Lynn had taken only the clothes and articles she most needed, and promised to communicate with Mrs. Kime frequently. But as the first week passed and her life settled into the dreary days of fitful sleep and emotional nights of effort to please everyone who entered the round gloden door, she felt as if she were a new individual and lost all desire to communicate with her former existence. There was no reason to burden anyone with her self and her problems.

Mike, her employer, grew increasingly difficult to manage. But she refused to favor his advances.
Mike was furious, but Lynn was still valuable business asset. He would bide his time.

Jed came in one evening, and Lynn was overjoyed at seeing him.
She felt as if he were the only friend she had, although she had known him such a little while. His greeting was like that of an old friend, too.

"How goes it?" his shrewd eyes inquired more than his words.

"Splendidly!" Lynn affected enthusiasm.

"Come—sit down with me and have something."

"Oh—I don't think I should, thank you. So many people are coming—I don't think Mr. Perrone would want me to devote my time to you."

"Well—you're my hostess, remember," he grinned. "Anyway, I'll sit down over here and when you're not so busy, you can join me.
How's zat?"

Lynn nodded and turned to other arrivals.
