

"Miss America" Contest Again Lures Beauties

The fame they win may be fleeting but that doesn't keep America's perennial crop of beauties from lining up again in the hope of being crowned "Miss America, 1936" in this year's bathing beauty contest in Atlantic City the week of Sept. 8. In addition to the honor of being the nation's No. 1 beauty for a year, the winner is promised a stage tour and possibly a movie contract. With few exceptions, however, the winners learn that it takes more than a pretty face and a shapely figure to win lasting fame in the movies or on the stage, and they soon retire to private life and obscurity. But that fact doesn't worry the 1936 contestants, nor will it worry next year's crop of beauties. Contests will go on and on as long as there is someone to sponsor them. Among those competing for the throne vacated by lovely Henrietta Leaver, last year's winner, are Tommy Marie Peck, "Miss Alabama"; Dolly Mary Stewart, "Miss Maine" and Hilda Veale, "Miss Georgia", above.

"KING OF HEARTS"

BY EDNA ROBB WEBSTER

CHAPTER XXXV

At first, when Jack betrayed his deep personal concern for Lynn, Doti was angered. The feminine elemental fear of losing her man gripped her, and her thoughts fiercely renounced her cousin. No one ever had denied Doti what she wanted, and this suggestion of competition aroused her defense. She thought scathingly: Lynn would not accept her offer of financial assistance, the shelter of her home, the prestige of her influence for obtaining a position—but she would take away her most valuable possession, like a thief in the night! Then she blushed with secret remorse. Actually, she did not believe that Lynn had stolen Jack's love from her. She had gone so quietly and unobtrusively away—it was not fair to accuse her like that. But he had followed her so soon, and so eagerly. How did she know how much Lynn had influenced that trip north? Then reason assured her, but her heart never found her! Had Lynn lured him to her city, she certainly would have been there to greet him! No, if Jack had gone in search of Lynn, he had done so, voluntarily.

But as her first anger toward her cousin subsided, Doti was piqued at Jack's desertion. All their lives, the fact had been inferred and accepted that she would marry him and they would prolong the name and fortune of Merchon & Thorpe, together.

The idea had been so fixed that she felt lost at the mere suggestion of any other arrangement. Their families expected it, their friends, all the southern city expected it—even those who did not know them except by the linking of their prominent names. What chagrin would be hers, if Jack jilted her!

As the days lapsed into weeks after Jack's return home, he continued to see Doti less. The demands of business in his father's absence from the office, was his continual explanation. But he grew irritable, and though his healthy color returned with the vigor of the tropical sun, his haggard expression did not disappear. And Doti knew that the pressure of business cares did not warrant that. Her father had not grown haggard, even if economic conditions were difficult.

They went about together, but the old camaraderie had disappeared, somehow. Jack no longer ventured casual little intimacies which had seemed as natural as their childhood affections. Doti felt his remoteness, even when they danced together; felt his thoughts detached, even while he talked with her.

Gradually, she saw him less. Finally, there was an entire week when she did not see him at all. And to her surprise and dismay, Doti discovered that she scarcely had missed him. She had grown so accustomed to his presence that his absence was more like that of her father or mother. She missed him, and thought of him, but only with the assurance that she would see him soon. Her days and evenings were filled with delightful pleasures. There was always a gallant escort to fill Jack's place, and that place was being filled more frequently of late by one Avery Dillon, who was a novelty for her instead of a habit.

With a shock which was a mixture of regret and relief, Doti realized that was exactly what Jack-on Thorpe had become to her—a habit. So long as she had him, she

What Are You Doing About Rising Food Prices?

The cost of food is rising. The drought this summer will cause still further increases in food costs—a serious problem for the average family. You can do something by judicious buying and careful use of cheaper foods to help keep down the food cost item in the family budget. Our Service Bureau at Washington can help you do this. Here is a group of six bulletins that you will find of interest.

The titles are:

1. Cans of Food in the Home
2. Economy Recipes
3. Low Cost Meals
4. How to Use Leftovers
5. Light Housekeeping Dishes
6. Fruit Dishes
