Named President Of Purdue Winter Short Course Society

Joel Habegger, of Monroe township, has been elected president of the Purdue winter short course society, according to an announcement made today by County Agent L. E. Archbold.

The society is made up of 185 young men and composes the four courses given during the winter term, which are general agriculture, animal husbandry, dairy manufacturing and dairy production. Mr. Habegger is enrolled in the latter course.

It was pointed out that it is a very unusual distinction for a young man to be elected president of the society and the first year he attends the school.

Mr. Habegger was the winner of one of the four $50 scholarships given by the pure milk association of Chicago, for the best essays on the care of dairy herds and the best set of records.

His tuition of $10 has been paid because his essay on Father and Son partnerships entered in the Adams county contest, was adjudged winner. He was alternate in this contest, which was won by Lawrence Beckmeyer, who was unable to attend.

"LUXURY" MODEL by MAY CHRISTIE

SYNOPSIS
On the train, enroute to her home in Los Angeles from college, lovely Elizabeth Harmon meets handsome Gerald Bruton, young stock broker. At luncheon, when Elizabeth compares college to prison, a hard look creeps into Gerald's face and, later, when a man approaches their table and exclaims, "I never expected to see you in this part of the world!" he turns white. At home, Elizabeth's step-father, Colonel James McCarthy, forbids her to go out with Gerald, so she arranges to meet him clandestinely.

CHAPTER III
She forgot everything in the warmth of Gerald's eyes, his strong handclasp as they met in the hotel lobby.

She was wearing a peach-colored sports suit in some woolly material that was very becoming. From her pert little hat her blonde curls peeped out like the wings of a Mercury. She looked lovely.

When he had helped her into a taxi and ordered the chauffeur to drive to the Miramar at Santa Monica, Gerald Bruton slipped an arm about her, whispering: "You're the most beautiful girl in the world."

Surely there never had been a more exquisite sunset than over the Pacific that evening!

"Painted specially for us," said Gerald, giving her hand a tiny squeeze as they sat at a table in the fashionable hotel overlooking the ocean.

Elizabeth said impulsively: "If we could only see the sunrise, Gerald."

His face was very solemn as he answered: "That would be a new beginning."

It was like a dream to dance to the crooning lilt of the high-priced orchestra. The waves of the Pacific blended with it, like the obligato played on a violin cello in some exquisite symphony.

The fragrance of Spring was here, its divine promise, it bloomed in the daffodils and freesia and narcissus on the little tables, in the golden light that spilled from the yellow lamps, like sunshine.

More diners arrived. The scene grew gay. Animated couples leaned across snowy tablecloths that glittered with silver. There was the clink of ice in glasses. Popping of corks. Waiters dashing hither and yon, with bottles set in tubs to cool, with bottles in napkins from which long necks, gold-labeled, protruded.

Elizabeth drew a long, rapturous breath. This was all new to her. Enchanted ground. This was real living.

Not even the memory of her step-father's harshness could dampen her joy. She danced with Gerald to the tune of: "Did You Ever See a Dream Walking?" The blood sang in her veins. She was on air.

Under his breath he crooned the words to her, holding her tightly. She closed her eyes, faint from his nearness and his fascination. They moved as one person.

"Happy, darling?"

"They were walking back to their table. He put his hand under her elbow. She swayed a little.

"Tremendously. I'm dizzy with it. I've never had such an evening."

A little silver bucket of ice was on their table, with a champagne bottle in it, up against the vase of freesias. All her life afterwards, the piercingly sweet odor of those flowers was to recall this scene to Elizabeth.

The waiter poured the champagne and went away. Elizabeth took a spray of freesia from the vase, brushing it across her lips. Gerald leaned towards her, captured the hand that held the blossom. He said: "Elizabeth, don't you realize I'm falling more and more in love with you? What are we going to do about it?"

"Gerald, I see stars. Millions of them. Look over the ocean. D'you think they're windows with the angels looking down on us tonight? I think so."

There were tears in her eyes as she gazed up at the dark blue canopy overhead. The greatest thing in the world had happened to her. She had fallen in love, and her love was reciprocated.

Had she looked at him at that moment, she would have seen a queer, strained look on his face.
