plugging the administration. As secretary of labor Frances Perkins searched for a new plan to bring peace in the General Motors controversy, a disagreement between the union and steel companies controlling so-called "captive" mines appeared moving toward a possible walkout. Representatives of steel corporations and Lewis' United Mine Workers admitted that union insistence on applying the existing check-off system to additional assessments on U. M. W. members is "leading to trouble."

The check-off consists of a deduction by operators from miners' salaries which is paid into union treasuries. It has been used by Lewis to build U. M. W. into a powerful organization. The controversy, it was learned, exists "at present" only between Lewis and steel companies operating "captive" (term used to denote a mine operated by an industry entirely for its own use—Ed.) Mines in which U. M. W. claims 25,000 members. Independent operators thus far have not protested the increased check-off.

Lewis is insisting, it was learned, that U. M. W. per capita dues be increased from $1 to $2 beginning this month to provide for emergency expenditures.

Operators of mines controlled by steel corporations are refusing to pay the increase into U. M. W. funds. They regard the additional assessment as a "war chest" and possible strike fund for Lewis' steel organizing campaign.

session is expected to be a mere formality.

Townsend told the legislators that his office was so crowded with flood problems that even the members of the assembly themselves could not get through the halls to see him. As a result, Townsend said, he had absolutely no time to devote to legislative matters and that the flood ravages demanded his primary consideration.

The governor told the caucus it could either take a ten-day holiday or adjourn the 1937 session altogether with his promise that as soon as the flood situation eased he would call a special session to transact all necessary business. Townsend reminded the caucus that the 1937 legislature already had been in session for 22 days without accomplishing much, and in view of other emergencies the adjournment could be taken easily.

The caucus lasted less than half an hour before agreement was reached on the ten day recess. When Townsend's proposal first became known, opposition arose from farm areas to a later session, many pointing out that too long a delay would bring the session into the farm planting season. Others thought the legislature should stay in session to deal with any flood emergencies. Townsend, however, observed that many of the assembly members could be of assistance in their own communities and won the adjournment agreement.

Two of Townsend's flood proposals were given instantaneous action yesterday afternoon. Under suspension of the rules a bill was passed appropriating $250,000 for men in the flood areas, and a resolution of the national guardsmen was approved immediately extending the gross income tax payment date to April 15 in the counties bordering the Ohio river. Otherwise, the assembly confined itself to routine procedure, filing an avalanche of petty bills, 42 measures being introduced into the house alone.

These included proposals for licensing private detectives, controlling hog cholera, regulating street carnivals, forbidding barmaids and waitresses in taverns or restaurants serving liquor, providing free clinics, and various other matters.

Chairman Martin Downey and his judiciary A committee were given most of the proposals, probably to suppress for the administration.
