Behind the Scenes in HOLLYWOOD

HOLLYWOOD—In case the boys and girls would still like to know, La Garbo's Swedish artist friend—the one she has been lunching with—is Erno Nerman, over here painting some covers for a London magazine. But the girl he is seeing most of now is Loretta Young, an eye-ball for any artist. Besides visiting together on the "Love Under the Sea" set, they've had several dates.

The Chaplin studio is still waiting its first visit from Charlie since last June. He has almost disappeared from his Hollywood haunts, too. At the moment, he and Constance Collier have become roommates. She is coaching Paulette Goddard in diction—against the nebulous time when the comedian finally gets under way on Paulette's picture.

Little Freddie Bartholomew stayed up past his bedtime to see the preview of "Captain's Courageous", his greatest picture since coming to Hollywood. He and his Aunt Clara heard a tearful audience burst into fierce applause... a tribute to a film that combines high adventure with touching sentiment... a tribute to Spencer Tracy's superb portrayal of a Portuguese fisherman... and to Freddie's own performance, which is the finest passage of sustained acting ever achieved by a child on the screen. We can't recommend this picture too highly. It is a rare experience in the cinema.

About this time of the year, Directors Leo McCarey and Greg

La Cava always have had a date with Bill Fields to play golf at Dei Monte. The trio is now broken up by Bill's illness, but McCarey and La Cava went ahead with the annual outing.

Just as they were about to leave, a letter arrived from Fields. "Sorry I can't go," he wrote, "but enclosed you'll find a check to cover my usual losses."

Ann Sothern is shopping for a home site in Beverly Hills, and will probably start building as soon as she finishes "There Goes My Girl". She still expects to commute to Chicago to be with Roger Pryor, but he is trying to get orchestra dates lined up out here. Anyway, says Ann, she is going to retire in a few years, and wants to have a place to hang her hat.

Day's gossip... There were more than 200 guests at the Basil Rathbone's eleventh anniversary party the other night and the costumed practically sold out their bride and groom outfits... It was so near to being a serious accident at the Samuel Goldwyn studio. Leona Maricle, playing in "Woman Chases Man", was doing a scene in a tree 16 feet from the ground. In the midst of it, she fainted and fell head-first to the ground. A frightened company brought her around 15 minutes later and, apparently, she escaped with a badly bruised shoulder... The 12 advertising models imported by Walter Wanger for "The Vagabond of 1936" live in two bungalows, which the company leases for them, and have a bodyguard constantly on duty... The Franchot Tones celebrated his birthday at the Trocadero and Phil Ohman presented them with a big cake... John Boles has all the luck. He crashed into a car in a parking lot and, instead of being sued, was soundly kissed by the owner, a Texas girl, who said that squared him for the crump'd fender.
