SUSAN, THERE ARE SOME THINGS I CAN'T UNDERSTAND. MR. POPEYE SAYS HE'S A GENTLEMAN AND HE SEEMS TO THINK THAT THAT MAKES EVERYTHING ALL RIGHT.

OH, HE CERTAINLY IS A GENTLEMAN. AND HE'S KIND-HEARTED, TOO. LOOK WHAT HE DID FOR ME.

WHAT DID HE DO FOR YOU, SUSAN?

HE TOOK ME TO THE FRUIT STORE. HE HAD ME ARRESTED BECAUSE I'D BEEN LIVING OFF THE FRUIT I'D STOLEN. YOU SEE, I DIDN'T WANT TO STARVE TO DEATH. I WAS ON MY WAY TO JAIL WHEN MR. POPEYE CAME ALONG.

HE GOT ME AWAY FROM THE OFFICER AND CARRIED ME TO MY ROOM. I WAS PUT OUT OF MY ROOM BECAUSE MY BROTHER WHO WAS SUPPOSED TO TAKE CARE OF ME, DISAPPEARED AND I HAD NO MONEY.

I WAS TAKEN TO JAIL. THEN POPEYE TORE THE BARS FROM MY CELL WINDOW AND GOT ME OUT. YOU SEE, HE GOT HIMSELF IN TROUBLE JUST TO HELP ME. SO WE TURNED TRAMPS. HE THOUGHT I'D GET MY HEALTH BACK OUT IN THE SUN-SHINE.

AND LISTEN, I USED TO THINK HE WAS THE UGLIEST MAN ON EARTH. BUT NOW I THINK HE'S HANDSOME—YOU'LL THINK SO, TOO, WHEN YOU KNOW HIM BETTER.

"Rich Girl - Poor Girl"

by FAITH BALDWIN

CHAPTER XX

Jonathan thought, driving his own car toward the house of his parent, how'd she know about me and Rose?

For the first time it occurred to him that the small town tolerates anything but a private life.

On the following morning he was in his office after breakfast when Rose called to him from the yard. He let her in at the side door. She said breathlessly, "I'm on my way to school."

"I'll drive you. I'm going your way."

"You look tired," she said, "out last night?"

"I got home after midnight. . . I had a call."

"After the movies?" she asked casually.

"I didn't see you," he said astonished. "I telephoned and your mother said you were out. I looked for you in the theatre. Were you there?"

Rose laughed suddenly. She answered, "I wasn't. But lots of other people were. You'll get used to living in a glass house after a while. I just came up this morning to congratulate you on the school appointment."

"Now, how in the world," he asked her, going into the hall to get his things, "did you hear that?"

The very blue eyes danced. She answered, "Oh, I get around."

"I was going to tell you," he explained, as they drove away from the house, "that's why I telephoned yesterday evening. But it isn't confirmed yet. There has to be a Board meeting."

"If Senator Sutton says you're to be school physician," said Rose, looking away from him, "you'll be school physician—and like it."

"I expect to," he said promptly. He was somewhat annoyed. She spoke of Sutton as if he were a puppet-master. Jonathan didn't much care for the role of puppet.

He said impulsively, "Look here, don't get the man wrong. . . I mean. . . Of course, he's pompous and arrogant and all that but he really cares a lot about Riverport, he has his interest at heart."

"Only," said Rose coldly, "if they force her own."

"How could they?" asked Jonathan. "At least give the devil his due."

"Oh," stressed Rose, "he's vain. . . and he likes to indulge his vanity. It doesn't cost him any more than he can afford or more than it's worth to him."

Jonathan said, "I think you've a pretty biased point of view."

"How about yours?" challenged Rose. "I suppose however, that when you're in his camp you're bound to make excuses." Her eyes had darkened and the colour was bright in her cheeks.

"Not at all," said Jonathan, "I haven't done anything. . . I mean if he's gone out of his way to be decent to me, it wasn't of my seeking."

That sounded rather halting. He tried again. He said, "Of course I understand when you've grown up to believe he was your private ogre. . . a small town's viewpoint is apt to be narrow."

She said furiously, "And I suppose you can come in here with your larger point of view and tell us how unjust we've been? I suppose you want the few people left in Riverport with a sense of independence and self-respect to grovel in the gutter when royalty passes by. I've lived in this town for twenty-four years and you've lived here just five months. You make me tired."

"Why, Rose—" he began, astonished.

"Oh, I'm sorry," she said, flushed. "I didn't mean—I've an absurd anyway. Out with it!" demanded Sutton, very much amused.

Trade In A Good Town — Decatur

He and Jonathan were alone at the dining room table in the Sutton house. Sally was answering a telephone call and Mrs. Sutton had disappeared at the close of dinner.

Sutton pushed the brandy decanter over to Jonathan. "Jonathan shaking his head, smiled slightly."

"Mrs. Loring's little boy," he reported clearly, "over-eats. Both at meals and between meals. He also goes to too many motion pictures. And he is completely spoiled. Otherwise, there's nothing whatever the matter with him."

"Do you know," said the Senator cautiously, "I always thought that child a brat. . ."

"And you to his mother?"

"I'm afraid I did," admitted Jonathan ruefully. He looked up at his host. He said, "I am licensed to practice medicine. I haven't come to practicing deception yet. Medicine has its flaws. It isn't an exact science. But I refuse to tell a woman that her child suffers from nervous breakdown when he suffers from nothing more or less than a devilish disposition due entirely to his bringing up."

The Senator sobered. He said, "swirling his brandy around in the enormous glass. 'And I admire you for it, my boy. But you must remember you are just beginning. A diet of a few sugar pills—fact—after all you hurt me one by these and you keep your patients. It's all very well to be honest and, shall we say to lean backward, in your job, whatever it is. . . but you'll reach the place some day when you can afford these luxuries and when people will pay you liberally for high-handed treatment. . . but until you do reach that place you'll have to learn to curb your inclinations and—well, be diplomatic. I'll fix it up with Gerry, of course.'"

"Thanks," said Jonathan curtly. "The Senator was annoyed. He wasn't accustomed to having his efforts of assistance refused so brusquely. However, he regarded the younger man with something very like admiration. Sutton was at the top of the heap because of his methods, which were not peculiar to him alone, and which were a combination of authentic brains, real force, ruthlessness, and vanity. Jonathan's methods, apparently, unless a word to the wise did prove sufficient, would be quite dissimilar and of a type which the Senator characterized as "soft." Not that it took softness to let Gerry Loring the truth; that took strength. It was this strength in Jonathan Kimber which the Senator, if against his will, was forced to admire."

Sally came back from the phone. She said crossly, "For heaven's sake, haven't you two stopped settling the affairs of the nation yet? Surely I'm just as important. Come along, Kim. Have you made up your mind to go to Placid with us, after all?"

"Of course he has," boomed the Senator, "do him a world of good. Needs it. It's all arranged."

So that was that. Jonathan went down beneath the wheels of the juggernaut and found the sensation not entirely unpleasant.

Placid was amusing. He felt like a fool on skis, stumbling around and sticking head first in snow banks to Sally's obvious delight. He looked like a fool, too, he believed, and he was a little alarmed at the cost of the equipment which it was essential to possess. . . But the air was chilled wine in a crystal cup, the sky was pure turquoise and Sally had never been prettier.

Britain Has 200 "Outlaws" London (UP)—Nearly 200 persons in the British Isles are outlaws and, according to law, may be shot on sight. They are descendants of the Clan MacDonnell, famous in the 1715 and 1745 Stuart rebellions. Now an effort is being made to have the law repealed.
