"Rich Girl-Poor Girl" by FAITH BALDWIN

CHAPTER XXIV

Rose came down to find Evelina almost in convulsions in the kitchen because Jonathan was "messing about in the pantry." Rose soothed her and went to the debated ground to find Sally smoking, perched on a table and Jonathan shaking up the cocktails in a mammoth shaker he had borrowed from Bill Lynd. Sally was saying "... I could have lent you Hardy and spared you all this."

How sweet of her, thought Rose, her little face gleamed, smooth and rosy. Her lovely heavy hair was burnished to brightness, and her lips were a softer crimson than Sally's. And her absurd little dress was entirely satisfactory. It was the color of her eyes and she had made it herself.

Sally said, "Oh, here you are, Rose. I was talking to Kim about a weekend. He swears he can't get away. You persuade him. After all, if he's really needed he can get to the mainland in two shakes of a cat's tail, and we're only a little way out of town. I'm having some people up from down state."

"Anybody home?" boomed Bill Lynd from the front door. "Hey, Kim, where the heck are you?" He came in with his sister and her husband and Rose and Jonathan went to the hall to meet them.

"You're looking excessively plain," said Bill, admiringly to Rose. Then, catching a glimpse of Sally trailing languidly after them he added, "And you, too, if I may say so, Miss Sutton."

She gave him a slow smile. "You may," she decided graciously, "a couple of times. How do you like my taste in slip-covers?"

She indicated a fat chair, an old sofa. Bill looked amazed but bore up nobly. "A little on the restrained side," he decided laughing. "Isn't that a car?" he looked out. "It's Dexter," he announced, with a marked lack of enthusiasm.

The party was a great success. It was after ten when they reached the country club. Rose dancing with Bill, watched over his shoulder. Sally and Phil Dexter trying out new steps. They seemed to have a good deal to laugh about. She thought suddenly and comfortably. After all, they're made for each other, those two; she doesn't really mean anything when she looks at Jon. Jonathan was making himself agreeable to Miss Anderson; and Bill said lazily to Rose, "Pretty festive occasion if you ask me. Rising young physician proves social riot. Now ..."

Someone had cut in. Rose found herself looking up at Larry Dexter. Larry said smoothly "I may, of course," and detached her skillfully. He danced very well. He said, guiding her deftly, "This is a lot better than books, isn't it Miss Ward?"

Rose said, "It's been a grand evening ... I didn't expect to see you, Larry."

"No," he smiled down at her. "Of course you didn't. I saw Sally a little while ago. Your young man might have asked me to the party."

"He isn't my young man," said Rose with proper indignation and added, "It was a grown-up party anyway, Larry."

Larry laughed. He said, "Thanks. That puts me in my place. But then I'm awfully old for my age, and you're awfully young for yours, dear teacher."

He added presently as she did not reply that he had been glad to hear she might be down on the island. And Rose, forgetting discretion asked, "Why?"

"Oh, the Dexter Island's just a stone's throw. And there's a bridge. I'll be seeing you," he said lightly.

She was delighted to have Jonathan cut in, and without much apology, a moment later. Larry went off nonchalantly, his hands in his pockets. And Jonathan said, "It was a nice evening till that slug-wandered along. You looked beautifully distressed."

She said, "It's silly, isn't it? The minute he cut in I felt as if I were in a closed room!"

"Not," said Jonathan, "that I blame him. After all, he has eyes in his head ... which is probably empty otherwise." He looked at her appreciatively. "Sally said you'd consented to go to the island."

"I didn't really mean it. That is—it was just one of those things," said Rose. "What earthly reason can she have for asking me?"

"I presume she wanted you," replied Jonathan obtusely, "and, after all, you youngsters went to school together. She's just being friendly."

"I see," said Rose, frowning. After a moment she said, smiling at him, "In that case, I think it would be rather fun to go."

If he thought her jealous of Sally she'd want to curl up and die! "It's to be toward the end of the month," said Jonathan. "I hope the weather's decent. I begin to look forward to it."

"Can you swim?" asked Rose seriously.

Jonathan laughed. "Even in the Middle West," he told her, "there are lakes. Of course I can swim. I may not dance any too well," he added a moment later, missing a step, "but I'm elegant in the water. I can even row a boat."

"That's good," said Rose, "seeing that we'll be on an island. But the river isn't a lake, by any manner of means. You haven't even a speaking acquaintance with the river. And the Sutton island isn't very far from the swift water."

"I see," commented Jonathan, as the music stopped, "that your little pupil has consoled himself."

Rose looked up to see Larry and a girl leaving the room together. She recognized the girl. It was Millie Downing. She thought, troubled. Her parents probably don't know she's here.

"It's the Downing girl," she said abruptly.

"Yes, I know," said Jonathan frowning. "She's made up like a circus performer but I could see the outline of a face under it."

Some time later, Rose, who had been dancing with Bill Lynd, saw Phil Dexter, his face as dark as a thundercloud, coming across the floor. He went directly to Sally and took her from her current partner. He drew her into a corner and spoke to her rapidly. Sally looked annoyed and then she laughed. And presently Jonathan came in.
