was unreasonable, a purposeful attempt to evade surtaxes. "De Mille answered that his corporation was saving up money to go into the production of pictures at a later date, which was a proper accumulation of surplus. The court sustained De Mille. "Contrast this case," Helvering said, "with an individual who does not have his earnings paid to a corporation. Such an individual cannot avoid taxes on the money he is attempting to save to go into business in the future. "The vice of this transaction is that the individual is using a corporation artificially in a way which no one would have thought of had it not been for the income tax laws. The difficulty is that many courts find it difficult to draw the line between the artificial and genuine use of a corporation." DeMille was the second person prominent in motion pictures to be named before the joint congressional committee investigating methods allegedly used to avoid federal income tax payments. Previously the name of Charles Laughton, prominent character actor, was presented as being among those who had paid his salary to a British corporation as a means of reducing his income tax payments in this country.
