ZWICK'S

"THE CAPTIVE BRIDE"

by BARRETT WILLOUGHBY

SYNOPSIS

According to the terms of her father's will, Denise Keith, a young San Francisco socialite, must visit his hunting lodge, River House, on the Stikine River, in Tarnigan, Canada, before disposing of it. Larry Keith, an outfitter for big game hunters, loved the place and had lived there alone for years because his selfish, pampered wife, Sylvia, refused to spend even one month a year there. When he would not give it up, she divorced him and remarried. Aboard Captain Revely Bourne's Stikine Maid enroute to Tarnigan, Denny meets a varied lot of individuals enroute to River House for the hunting season. Among them are Dr. Pool Van Cleve, who is suffering from a nervous breakdown; Rio Carew, wealthy divorcee; Derek Haskell, Larry's half-breed guide, with whom Rio is enamored, and Harp MacFarlane, foreman of River House. The beauty of the surrounding country appeals to Denny and she wonders why her mother hated it so remembering her words: "The Stikine—it's a witch river. Dangerous. Cruel. It puts a spell on you. It won your father from me." Soon Denny would know for herself. Harp had spoken about the treachery of the Stikine, saying he was swift to see and lightning to act. Although Harp's praise had prejudiced Denny against Bourne, there was something about the blond captain which attracted her, even though she preferred dark men like her fiancé, Murray Hart. Denny had a glimpse of Bourne's character when his dog, Tongass, would have killed Rio's police dog in a fight had not Revely intervened and knocked his own pet senseless. "Not every man has the courage to be a brute to the thing he loves," Harp remarked to Denny.

CHAPTER VII

Later, when the West was brilliant with sunset, the Maid crossed the boundary between Alaska and Canada.

When the lonely yellow Custom-house flying the Union Jack came into view, some one commented, "We move from the Land of the Eagle into the Land of the Maple Leaf."

Denny, watching with the eyes of the South, the eyes of another nation, said to herself, "The country of my father; the flag of my father."

Dusk deepened. Poplars turned to black velvet, vagueness on the banks between which the river flowed like glinting ink.

The pilothouse was dark, but Denny could make out the dim figure of Captain Bourne at the wheel. Near him, on a seat against the wall, Tongass sat on his haunches, looking straight ahead. She was surprised when one of the engineers told her that the Maid would soon tie up to the bank. "No one can run the Stikine at night," he explained. "Too dangerous, even for a skipper like Revely Bourne."

Danger! All day long she had heard that word applied to the Stikine; yet it was plain that all these Northerners loved the river. From the galley now came the voices of Ted and Bourne and Harp, singing a river song. The chorused harmony of the chorus drifted out on the dusk.

"Oh, send me up the Stikine past the Boundary! Set me down and leave me there alone."

Let me laze along a bar In the golden Cassiar. It's the only land I want to call my own."

The words made her think of her father. This, in truth, was the only land that he had cared to call his own. It had been the cause of all the bitter quarrels and passionate reconciliations that had marked each of the five winters he had spent with Sylvia in their San Francisco home. Sylvia kept insisting that he sell River House and what she called his ridiculous business there, and go into her father's investment concern. He kept refusing.

He had gone north the last time, vowing he would remain at River House until she consented to spend at least one month of the hunting season with him there each year. She had retorted that he might go, but he never came back to her until he was ready to live permanently in California.

Denny knew now that these must have been foolish words spoken in the heat of anger, with no intention of fulfillment; but when Keith failed to come home that winter, Sylvia, in a high-handed effort to bring him to his senses, as she put it, had promptly divorced him. After six months' silence on both sides, she had married easy-going Paul Loftus.

As long as Larry Keith lived, she forwarded a monthly sum to Denny; a sum which Sylvia regarded as pin money for her own use. During those years he had waited for word from Sylvia. And now, when she had at last called to him, it had kept him from answering by taking him to himself forever.

She went swiftly over the events that had led up to the tragedy of his drowning six weeks ago.

A year ago Denny had met Murray Hart, dark, good-looking, two years her senior, and the most carelessly delightful companion any girl could wish. Murray was the matrimonial catch of her particular set. If at times he drank too much, there were many in Denny's young crowd who did likewise, and Murray was always affable in his cups. He was a driver of swift, foreign-made cars, a seeker for all that was new during all those years he had waited for word from Sylvia. And now, when she had at last called to him, it had kept him from answering by taking him to himself forever.
