Indiana Temp. and Rainfall—Nov. 29 to Dec. 5
The N. and W. portions of Indiana, moderately cool. Warm over the S. and E. areas. The extreme S.W. portion of the state, moist. Moderately wet over the S. S.E. and W. sections. Moderately dry over the N. E. cen. and cen. areas.

TIDES—WATER AND AIR
If earth's gravity were weaker air would immediately fly away into space. Air is made of molecules, little microscopic particles like dust grains, only much smaller. Each one of these molecules is a tiny moonlet going around the earth. If we had just the earth alone, without either a sun or moon, there would be no tides. Air would be quite calm. If we had just the moon alone, and if both earth and moon were absolutely round and the moon's orbit absolutely circular, and both earth and moon stood upright in their orbits there would be just two tides, one under the moon and one opposite the moon. But the orbit of the moon is tilted and the earth's motion irregular, so there must be another set of tides, making four in all. Tides can be easily observed by any one who goes to the sea shore. The water of the ocean rises and falls twice a day in response to the moon.

When we have three bodies, such as the earth, the sun, and the moon, the tidal pull "becomes complicated." Instead of there being four tides to consider, we have twenty-four, and these are arranged in a most peculiar fashion. There is a foundation of six tidal currents in both air and water, three north of the equator and three south, and surrounding these six currents there are two outer rings, one north of the equator and south, containing nine storms each, never more, and never less.
A study of geography shows the location of the six currents in sea and air. They are the Gulf Stream in the Atlantic Ocean, the monsoon winds of India, the Japan current in the Pacific Ocean, while in the southern hemisphere they are the cold Humboldt current of South America, the cold Benguela current of South Africa, and the cold West Australian current in the Indian Ocean. In the United States we only see a small portion of the total weather of the world, but world maps are now being made of the northern hemisphere in Europe and these show clearly that every day there are nine areas of rain or snow and nine areas of clear air strung around the circumference of the globe.

THE WEATHER BOX
Question—Is there going to be much snow this winter? C. B.
Answer—The western Plains, Mississippi Valley and Mountain States will get good snows. The Atlantic Coast will also have fairly deep snows. The Great Lakes area will have poorer snows.
Question—Will we have any floods in the Ohio River this coming spring? B. S. H.
Answer—February and March, normal flood months, will be inclined toward dry in the Ohio valley in 1938.
Question—What are the prospects for rain in Nebraska for 1938? C. H. S.
Answer—Spring rains will probably be fair to good; later the weather will be drier. These same conditions will apply to the nearby states also.
Question—Will California be warm this winter? N. S. D.
Answer—California will be less cold this winter than last winter, but the season cannot be classed as warm.
Question—What is a sign of when the sun sets red? L. S.
Answer—A red sunset shows much water vapor in the air.

"Beauty's A Charm" HARRIET HINSDALE

CHAPTER XXXI
"You see," Ames exclaimed, perhaps a shade too vehemently. "Not a thing in the world to get burned up over."
"I know," Lucy Lee smiled. "It was silly of me. I'm still a little nervous, I suppose. But if anything were to happen to Clyde again, I don't believe I could stand it."
"Migosh, gal, there's nothing on God's green earth to worry about. You and Clyde are sitting on top of the world! That lad is getting the biggest break of the century. It's magnificent, stupendous, super-colossal!"
Clyde was indeed basking in the reflected rays of Loring glory—lavishly publicized by the studio advertising staff, as any factory proclaims the value of its wares to prospective customers. Clyde was receiving checks the size of which at first seemed to him outside the realms of actuality, but finding they were really cashable. Clyde was amazed, then ever so slightly complacent over stacks of fan mail received at radio station and studio. And perhaps most surprising of all, Clyde was in make-up, playing scenes before camera and microphone!

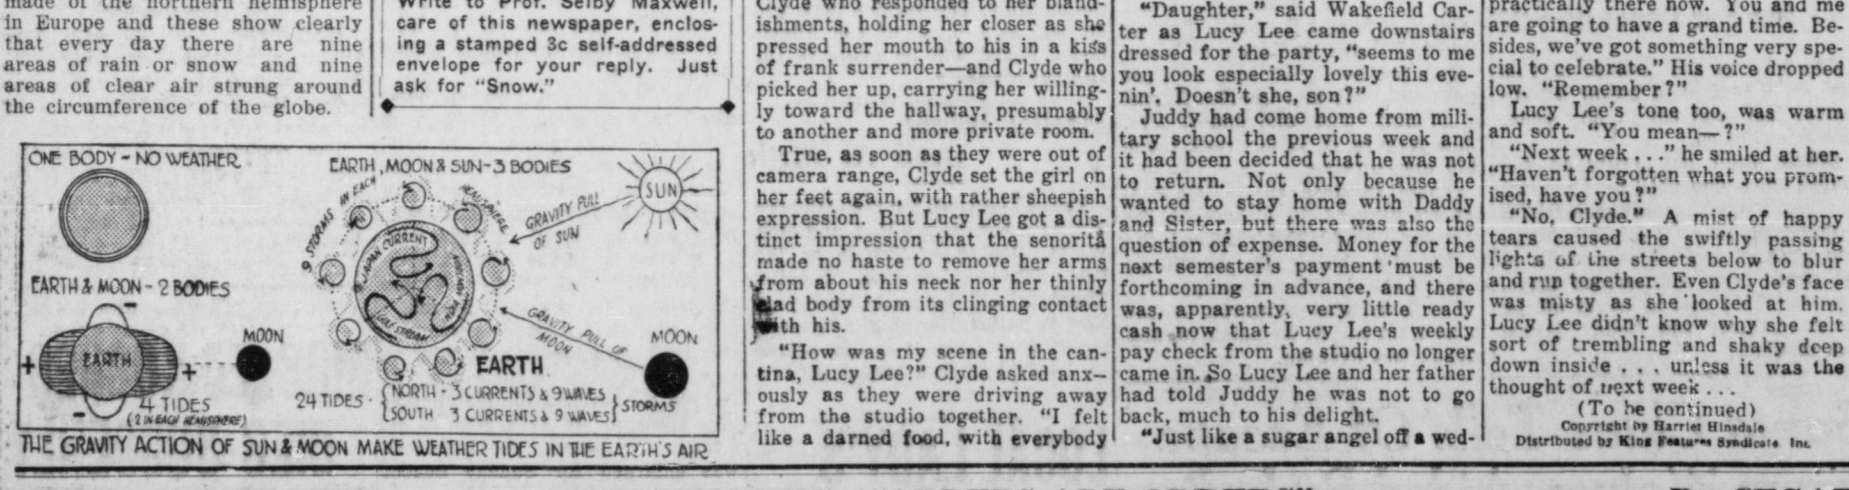

The setting was a Central American cantina filled with roisters on a gala night and there was music of guitars, singing, dancing and love-making. The story required Clyde to enter, slightly intoxicated, drop down at a table in a secluded corner and call for wine. One of the dancing señoritas came on, and Lucy Lee saw that it was Gussie Gerhheimer, the newly christened Shirley Moore. Eyes flashing, a smile of obvious invitation on her lips, she undulated toward the newcomer—the young American who had drifted, half drunk, into the cantina.
It was with a sharp, uncontrollable feeling of disgust that Lucy Lee watched, even as she told herself it was only acting with no more reality than any of the other action going on before the cameras. But this was Clyde upon whose knee the girl was sitting and whom she was clasping in an amorous embrace. Clyde who responded to her blandishments, holding her closer as she pressed her mouth to his in a kiss of frank surrender—and Clyde who picked her up, carrying her willingly toward the hallway, presumably to another and more private room.
True, as soon as they were out of camera range, Clyde set the girl on her feet again, with rather sheepish expression. But Lucy Lee got a distinct impression that the señorita made no haste to remove her arms from about his neck nor her thinly clad body from its clinging contact with his.
"How was my scene in the cantina, Lucy Lee?" Clyde asked anxiously as they were driving away from the studio together. "I felt like a darned fool, with everybody watching all that monkey business. Gosh, if I could only be the way Bruce is—you know, forget it's all just a lot of make believe. To look at him, anybody would really think he meant what he was saying."

"I reckon that's the difference between a sure-enough actor and people like you and me, Clyde," Lucy Lee replied. "It never seems real to us. I used to feel foolish, too. But you were all right," she added quickly, seeing a look of disappointment on his face. "Just fine."
"Did Shirley tell you about the party tonight?"
"Who?"
"Shirley Moore—the girl who played the señorita I carried out," he explained with a return of the sheepish look.
"Oh, yes, of course. Shirley Moore. I'd forgotten. No, I didn't talk to her."
"Well, she's throwing a party tonight and wants us to come."
Lucy Lee hesitated. "Please, Clyde. I'd rather not. Really, I would."
"But honey, I told her we would be there. She likes you a lot, Lucy Lee. She was telling me what a swell girl you are and how you were both in that beauty contest together, and she knew all along you would win the prize because you were the prettiest of them all." He smiled at her, his boyish face alight.
Lucy Lee's smile was a little weary for she was remembering "Miss Parisian Toiletries" venomous hatred at Atlantic City. "Did she really say that, Clyde?"
"Yeah, and a lot more nice things about you. So of course I said we'd come to the party. We can leave early, if you get tired, but Shirley will be awfully disappointed if we don't show up. She made me promise."

"And it wouldn't do to disappoint Shirley, would it?" answered Lucy Lee. "We'll go if you want to, Clyde, of course." She hesitated, wondering if she ought to tell him about "Miss Parisian Toiletries." "Only
"Only what, sugar?"
"Oh, nothing." How could she reveal what she was really thinking about the ex-Gussie Gerhheimer?
"Daughter," said Wakefield Carter as Lucy Lee came downstairs dressed for the party, "seems to me you look especially lovely this evening. Doesn't she, son?"
Juddy had come home from military school the previous week and it had been decided that he was not to return. Not only because he wanted to stay home with Daddy and Sister, but there was also the question of expense. Money for the next semester's payment must be forthcoming in advance, and there was, apparently, very little ready cash now that Lucy Lee's weekly pay check from the studio no longer came in. So Lucy Lee and her father had told Juddy he was not to go back, much to his delight.
"Just like a sugar angel off a wedding cake," Juddy agreed enthusiastically as he looked her over.
"It's the white dress," Lucy Lee smiled, inspecting herself in a mirror. "I do hope Clyde likes it."
"Clyde certainly does," came a laughing voice from the doorway. "I rang the buzzer and walked right in. Evening, everybody."
Lucy Lee whirled, staring. "Why, Clyde—"
"Uh-huh... it's me, in the new soup and fish." He turned slowly about. "What's the verdict?"
"You look perfectly wonderful, Clyde. Why, I hardly knew you. I mean—"
"Don't apologize, honey," he smiled. "I don't hardly know myself in this outfit yet. But just give me a little time and I'll learn what to do with my hands, maybe—if the Lord is kind to a suffering sinner. Come on, Lucy Lee, I reckon we'd better be getting on to the party, hadn't we? Shirley will be wondering what's happened to us."
They walked hand in hand down the pathway toward the waiting car. "Do you know where she lives?" she asked.
"Yeah," he answered. "I drove her home from the studio a couple of times. Her car was out of order, or something. Wait till you see the place. Pretty swell. That uncle of hers must be well fixed."
"What uncle?"
"I forget his name, but he's a big New York business man. Gives her an allowance so she can make a career for herself in pictures without having such a tough time of it as some girls have. You see, she's his favorite niece. That's why he's so generous to her."

They were driving along Sunset Boulevard now and Lucy Lee put her hand on Clyde's arm. "Please, Clyde, don't let's go to the party."
He flashed a quick look into her troubled face. "Why, nonsense, honey girl. Of course we're going. What's the matter?"
"I—I just don't feel like it any more."
He patted her hand reassuringly. "Now, that doesn't make sense, does it? Here we are, all dressed up and some place to go—when for no reason at all you suddenly change your mind. Snap out of it, sugar. We're practically there now. You and me are going to have a grand time. Besides, we've got something very special to celebrate." His voice dropped low. "Remember?"
Lucy Lee's tone too, was warm and soft. "You mean—?"
"Next week," he smiled at her. "Haven't forgotten what you promised, have you?"
"No, Clyde." A mist of happy tears clouded the swiftly passing lights of the streets below to blue and ran together. Even Clyde's face was misty as she looked at him. Lucy Lee didn't know why she felt sort of trembling and shaky deep down inside... unless it was the thought of next week...
