Matches A Luxury
In 1833 the cost of matches to the consumer was 37 cents per box of 100 matches. They were ignited by pulling them rapidly between two sheets of sandpaper.

"Beauty's A Charm" HARRIET HINSDALE

CHAPTER XXXII

Lucy Lee leaned her head against Clyde, feeling the powerful play of muscles as he turned the car into another street. How glorious it was going to be, always to have Clyde's strong arm to lean against like this, she thought, and forget all else. They were silent for the rest of the way, wrapped in close communion of mind and spirit, for each was thinking: "Next week."

The house which their hostess rented furnished from a featured actress who had been "free lancing" for a year and could not afford to keep the place up any longer, was set back from the street behind a close-clipped hedge, quite aloof and secluded. As Clyde and Lucy Lee approached the door she wondered rather nervously just how Shirley Moore, as she must now call "Miss Parisian Toiletries," would greet her. The last time they had spoken to each other was at the Coronation Ball in Atlantic City, when "Miss Parisian Toiletries" had flown into a rage over losing the crown to Lucy Lee. Odd, that they should be meeting again like this, here in Hollywood.

"Why, Lucy Lee darling—I simply can't tell you how glad I am you came! And of course Clyde too." The former Gussie Gerneimer held out a bejeweled hand to each of them, in the most approved movie-society-hostess manner. Then making the gesture of kissing Lucy Lee's cheek she held her off a little, eyes wide with admiration. "And looking more gorgeous than ever." She turned to Clyde with a ravishing smile. "Lucky boy! Have you heard the latest about the man who married the picture actress?"

Clyde flushed and someone in the room cried: "No, spring it, Shirley, I'll bite. What about the mug who married the picture actress?"

"His friend said: 'I hear you were married one day last week?' And the man said: 'As a matter of fact, it was two days.'"

Somebody guffawed.

"I'm awfully peeved at a friend of yours, Lucy Lee," Shirley went on. "Don't you know I invited him to my party he said he had to go to a stag affair given by some agent for the publicity men. Can you feature turning me down for one of those disgusting stag brawls? But there are a couple of old pals of yours here."

She put her arm about Lucy Lee and piloted her into the next room. "Adrienne Page and Neville Preston. Always together," she whispered. "Just another one of those Hollywood engagements—yes, you know, the kind that mean every thing—except marriage."

Lucy Lee would have turned and fled if she could, but there was nothing for it but to go on. Neville and Pearl were sitting in a shadowy corner and as they approached she rose with his usual charming manner. "If it isn't our little Lucy Lee. How are you? And the lucky chap who has won her. Congratulations, old man."

When Don Ames had told Shirley Moore that he couldn't come to her party because he had promised a man to attend his, he was stating only the simple truth.

One of the more prominent of the Hollywood theatrical agents felt the urge to stage a festive evening for men only, feminine participation being limited to the appearance of several scantily clad dancers and entertainers. Most of the men who had received invitations to the affair went because, to their simple minds, it seemed "good business." Each hoped to "hook up with some guy who might throw something my way." You never could tell.

But for Ames it proved to be a boring and profitless affair. Soon after dinner he decided to quit the party. Why not finish the evening at Shirley's bawls? In five minutes he was on his merry way.

Shirley's party had progressed through early stages of innocuous boredom, when everyone talked and behaved with the usual inhibitions of polite society, to that much more exciting and natural state of alcoholic stimulation when to be oneself was raucously applauded. Shirley had most considerably disappeared from the scene, leaving her guests to their own devices and the apparently inexhaustible supply of liquor and food.

Lucy Lee had wanted to leave the place long since, but naturally could not depart without Clyde, and she had not laid eyes on him for an hour. Thinking to get her wrap and Pearl smiled upon Lucy Lee. Beautifully gowned, perfectly coiffured and discreetly jeweled, her poise and appearance were flawless. It was as if she had been magically melted and poured into a new and triumphant mold.

"I always told you Clyde would be famous some day, didn't I, dear?" She turned to him and placed a hand on his arm. "Clever boy! How is that wonderful Bruce Loring? They say you're marvelous in the picture. Especially that hot love scene with Shirley here. Naughty... naughty... eh, Shirley?"

"If that's the way you're going to talk, Clyde and I are starting right away from here, aren't we, Clyde? No place for us, I can see that. You're putting ideas in our innocent minds." Laughingly she drew him away and Lucy Lee saw them disappear through the sunroom toward the patio beyond.

Pearl laughed and in her hard blue eyes Lucy Lee saw the Pearl of other days. "Better marry him soon, Lucy Lee," she drawled, "before dear Gussie gets him away from you. Clyde is just damn fool enough to fall for her line. And she certainly seems to be going after him in a big way."

Lucy Lee did not answer. She could not. Words would have choked her. She only stared miserably after the two who had gone out together. As soon as she could she slipped away from Pearl and Neville.

"Let me help you locate him," Preston answered. "He is probably out in the garden somewhere. Shall we look?"

He took her arm and led her out through the open French doors to the patio beyond which lay the extensive gardens, shadowy with trees and shrubs. They walked slowly along the gravelled paths. Somewhere in the darkness there was a sudden tinkling. Of a sudden Lucy Lee didn't want to search any farther and she shivered slightly as she turned back toward the house again.

"I—I think I would rather wait inside."

"Please, Lucy Lee. Give me just a minute. There are things I should like to explain. Here, you must have your wrap on." He placed it over her shoulders and with the gesture, held her closely clasped in his arms. Surprise kept her silent, speechless for a long moment. "I'm still mad about you, beautiful," Preston whispered.

There was a stir in the darkness behind them and a man stepped out of the shadows into the half light where they stood. He swayed a little and put a hand on the sun dial to steady himself. It was Clyde, and Lucy Lee, released from Preston's embrace, came hurrying toward him. She laid a hand on his arm but he shook it off, swaying slightly and staring at her with a strange expression on his flushed face.
