Charlie McCarthy Radio Announcer, Says Purdue Pupil

Lafayette, Ind., Jan. 27.—(UP)—Several hundred education students at Purdue University know their big apple but are a little vague on names like War Admiral and Charlie McCarthy.

In an informal test on identifying names recently prominent in the news some of the outstanding faux pas were:

Charlie McCarthy, Edgar Bergen's dummy and radio's "man of the year," "a sports announcer, machine gun style."

War Admiral, one time Kentucky derby winner — "a ship sent by Japan to the United States."

Glenn Frank, chairman of the new Republican program committee — "A leftist leader in Spain."

Howard Hughes, millionaire speed flier, "An aged member of the supreme court."

The students were all correct on Amelia Earhart and Shirley Temple but no one could identify Col. George D. Aiken of Vermont, who proposed the Republican reorganization.

Joe Louis, Myrna Loy and Coronation were identified correctly by all but one student in each instance.

The average answer was 43 right out of a possible 100.

Dixie Howell To Coach In Arizona

Tempe, Ariz., Jan. 27.—(UP)—Millard (Dixie) Howell, former university of Alabama halfback, today attained the first of the two major ambitions, when he became head coach of football at Arizona state teachers college here.

Howell's other aim, to become a major League baseball star, probably never will be attained, and it was said that he likely would resign from his outfield berth with the Tulsa club of the Texas league.

"GIVE HER WINGS" by MARIE BLIZARD

CHAPTER XXXI

What she thought was going to be a heavenly holiday had turned into an endurance contest.

Julie admitted the sad truth that she wasn't having a good time. She was like a character in a smart society novel, a house-guest in the kind of a house she had dreamed about in her romantic dramatizations. There was a maid to press her clothes, serve her breakfast, run her tub. She had attractive men to pay her attentions, to plan good times for her. She had better clothes than she had ever had before. If she wanted to play tennis or golf, she could play against a background that surpassed anything she had ever pictured. If she wished to swim, she could swim in a private pool or at a private beach.

It wasn't fun.

In her honest, analytical way she admitted that she simply didn't "belong."

There was no friendship, no ties of mutual attraction between her and Nancy. It was Nancy's house and Nancy had been as kind as she was casual about inviting Julie, but the lack of Nancy's interest—for all her politeness—was deeply felt by Julie. She felt that she was there under sufferance, knew that she should have left after the weekend.

Yet she had justified her presence. She added to the party. Nancy had said she needed another girl to amuse her men guests. Only that wasn't the way it was done in Fayette. You were invited to a party because your hostess liked you and you stayed because you knew you were wanted.

You had fun in Fayette. You didn't meet people who talked about people you didn't know, who smiled and smiled when you knew they were only tolerating you.

A wave of nostalgia swept over her. Nostalgia for people she knew, for places that were familiar to her. They had more fun at the country club parties or even just dropping in to somebody's house for an evening than these people had for all their expensive playthings and pastimes.

In retrospect things that Julie had forgotten came back to her with pleasant remembrance. How much fun it was to gather in a girl's bedroom before a party started, pondering your nose and talking about the little things that happened during the day. How pleasant the smells of baking ginger-bread, the fresh, clean grass-and-sunshine smell on a June day when you sat at the telephone and invited two or three people to supper. Meeting another couple after the movies and sitting over an ice-cream soda while you talked about what you had seen.

She wondered if Priscilla missed her. If Cousy had got over her hay fever. If her father had finished his experiment in the laboratory. Not for one moment did she think of Dick. She wondered what Tommy thought of the success of her exploits.

Why didn't she go home right away?

She got off her bed and took her suitcase out of the closet. She could say that she'd telephoned home and had a message to return. If she left at once she could return to her flying lessons, enjoy the sincere enthusiasm and congratulations of her friends, display her new clothes.

She put the suitcase back. She couldn't leave Paul. For a moment she had forgotten that she was in love with him.

She loved his sleek head, his beautiful clothes, his worldly manners, the invisible aura of his wealth. He was her Prince Charming, the movie idol in the cinema of her imagination.

Perhaps he had been "sort of engaged" to Elsa Herford for years but he had called her his girl.

Well, she wasn't going to walk out of it now. She'd stay and see whether Elsa Herford or Julie Allerdice was the better woman.

Elsa had the advantage of a social position equal to Paul's. She had had experience undoubtedly in handling men of her class but Julie was capable of meeting that experience. Elsa also had better clothes than Julie.

Elsa's clothes were a matter of comparison that struck Julie with a kind of cruelty. She had enjoyed her pretty new wardrobe, been confident that for all they were not expensive—but how expensive they were to her!—they were effective. Until Elsa had appeared in three costumes the day after her arrival. Three sets of clothes and accessories that Julie was quick to see were gems of taste and workmanship. Her own eleven-ninety-eight tennis dress looked worn exactly that same time Elsa's Paris frock. Her cotton gloves were cheap and shapeless when compared with Elsa's thick white doekins. Her things were absurdly girlish compared to the sophisticated simplicity of the other girl's frocks.

Angry tears tipped Julie's lashes into stony points and she jammed her fists into the pockets of her tweed skirt.

Just wait until she got back to Fayette! Thinking of the effect she would create there, her thoughts veered off to another effect she meant to create some day. She gave herself up to vindictive dreaming.

She saw herself in a beautiful black gown—all her clothes would be beautiful, would be created for her by the Parisian couturiers—meeting Elsa at parties, smiling at her with an amused smile. Julie would do the smiling then. She'd invite Elsa to her various homes where Elsa would see what a perfect wife she made for Paul, see Paul's devotion.

Her thoughts returned to Paul. He was not obviously devoted to Elsa but there was an intimacy between them that her sharpened sensitiveness was quick to feel. As though she had eyes in the back of her head, she knew when they were talking together, heard the murmur of their voices above all the others.

Yet Paul had not changed toward her. That morning he had sent the maid to her to ask her if she'd play tennis with him, found moments to whisper little meaningless things that she loved to hear.

She'd see it out, prove in some way that she was superior to Elsa Herford.

Her opportunity came that afternoon. Quite unexpectedly.

Nancy's sister had arrived earlier and when Julie passed Nancy's rooms on her way to the stairs, Nancy called out to her:

"Julie, do you play bridge?"

She said she did. Not adding that she was the best bridge player among the girls in Fayette. Since Christmas she'd won four bonbon dishes, eight guest towels, a dozen handkerchiefs and the Sunday-school tournament prize, a leather-bound edition of the Complete Works of Shakespeare.

"Thank the Lord! We need a fourth."

She sat down at the card table in Nancy's sitting-room. A pleasant anticipation pervaded her. It was born of a combination of her confidence in her game and the coming conflict. When they cut for partners, she had drawn Nancy as her partner. Elsa was her opponent. Nancy's sister, Kate Wyndham, didn't count. She was meeting Elsa on a field of battle with weapons she could handle with skill.

"Stakes?" Kate asked.

"The usual," Nancy answered.

In Fayette they played for a tenth. It wasn't likely they'd play in this game for more than a quarter of a cent a point. Julie thought about asking what the stakes were, thought better of it and opened the bid.

Luck was with her. She held beautiful cards, played them skillfully. Elsa was, she saw at once, a formidable opponent.

She was four hundred points ahead at the end of the first rubber.

"Nice work, partner," Kate said, and added, "I'd like a highball."

Nancy asked: "Anyone else?"

Julie said she didn't care for one. Her attention was for nothing but her game. She took a wicked delight in outplaying Elsa's skilled moves, in timing her own finesse.

They played silently, not chatting amiably and disconcertingly as they did at the Fayette games. Occasionally one of them said, "Nice play!" . . . or, "It should have worked." . . . or, "Partner, I'm sorry."

Julie had no need to say she was sorry. She played brilliantly.

Three hours later, Nancy said, "This will be the last rubber."

The scores were added up. Elsa went to get her pocketbook.

Julie discovered to her startled surprise that she had won thirty-five dollars. They'd played for half a cent.

She put the money in her purse saying as if it were of neither surprise or importance, "Thank you."

Elsa said, "You'll have to give me a game tomorrow. I want a chance to win it back."

"Certainly," Julie said courteously. She knew the ethics.

"Perhaps we can play later in the evening," Nancy said.

Julie looked forward to another game. If her luck held, she could recoup some of the money she'd spent and couldn't afford to spend. And if she lost, she couldn't lose more than she had won and would then break even.

After dinner, Paul caught her hand as she was going into the drawing room.

"I never get a chance to see you alone," he whispered. "Let's go out and look at the moon."

"Won't it look a little odd if we disappear?"

"He used the tone she wanted to hear. It said that there was no one there whose opinion he cared about. She went through the door to the screen porch and down the steps into the garden.

The garden was bathed in charreuse shot with silver. It was beautiful there and breathless with the loveliness of a summer night. She walked along a narrow path ahead of him, paused and turned back to tell him to look at the fountain in the moonlight.

When she turned, he was immediately behind her and she stepped into his arms.

He crushed her against himself, holding her so that she couldn't catch her breath.

"Oh, please Paul," she whispered, "Someone might . . ."

"I don't care about anyone! I'm mad about you," his lips were in her hair, on her eyelids, on her throat. "You're driving me crazy. You're so cool, so imperious! You weren't like this when you were in New York. You liked me then!"

"I like you now," she whispered with what little breath she had left. "Enough to . . ."

She wasn't sure what the rest of his unasked question was. She wanted to be sure not to make the wrong answer. She said, "Perhaps."
