"It's You I Want" by ALLENE CORLISS

CHAPTER I
THE last dance of the season was in full swing at the Marblehead Neck Country Club. Upstairs an orchestra from Boston played "Night and Day." It was a new tune that fell and the dancers couldn't get enough of it. They begged for more. They clapped and stamped their feet and cheered. They got more. They got a fourth encore. The boys in the band sliding into it softly, dragging it, wailing it, letting it moan and waver, letting it die a moment into a muted whisper. Couples who had danced together all summer and couples who had danced together for years and couples who would never dance together again clung and circled and bumped into each other and didn't mind because it was the last dance and the music was perfect and there was a swell crowd.

Down in the men's lounge, Todhunter Prentice Jarvis decided to go home. He wasn't having a good time. He hadn't expected to have a good time but, nevertheless, he was a little hurt to think he had been right about it. Tonight was simply the final flat period to the dull, uninspired sentence that had been the summer. A summer that had been totally without accent. That had been just a long three months. Absurd, of course, to let Whitney's being in Europe have washed up everything so completely. But it had. He had known that it would. Yet she wasn't his girl. Never had been. She was Scott's.

Where the devil was Scott? He hadn't seen him for hours. Not since he and Olivia Paul had been doing a tango together with everyone watching and applauding from the sidelines. That had been the first part of the evening. That had been about eleven o'clock. Nice kid, Olivia. She'd looked breath-taking in that white satin dress. And she certainly could dance. But someone ought to tell her that Scott belonged to Whitney. She obviously didn't know it and it wasn't quite fair. A guy like Scott ought to go around labeled "...hands off... I'm spoken for..." or something. He was too darn good-looking. Too attractive. A completely swell guy. Tod had adored him for years. Not just because they happened to be second cousins and had been brought up pretty closely and gone to the same schools and all that... but because there was no one quite like Scott. He was a little more everything than anyone else. A little better looking, a little better company, a little better informed about what went on and where. A lot quicker on his feet. There was no one quite like Scott. Unless, of course, it was Whitney. No one could touch Whitney. Not even Scott.

Tod tipped back his close-cropped brown head and half closed his eyes and there she was. He could always do that. Anywhere, any time, he could bring her right into the room with him. He'd done it for years... when he'd been a gangling kid at Groton and lonely as nobody's business because even then he hadn't had that trick of making friends easily the way Scott had. That happy faculty of throwing himself into any environment and dominating it. Absolutely. No matter where Scott went he took his own good time along with him. He set the pace and the others followed. It was a matter, really, of living intensely in the moment at hand, squeezing it dry of every pleasant possibility. Being, as it were, sufficient unto himself. Always. Scott didn't need Whitney around to make things come out even.

But Tod did. He had during his short life spent countless hours in her company which she never knew about. Like tonight, for instance. Tonight she was really on her way home from Europe on board an ocean liner. Yet, by half closing his eyes and thinking hard, he could bring her into this room with him. He liked to think of her best in sports clothes... a pink linen tennis dress, white canvas shoes, a black ribbon tied around her crisp dark hair. He thought of her that way tonight. And was suddenly filled with a terrible loneliness. It was as if the whole summer pushed itself into one slow, painful heartbeat and became mixed up somehow with the music upstairs and the wind howling around the clubhouse windows. Funny how Scott could go on. He hadn't seemed to mind too much.

By half closing his eyes and thinking hard, Tod could bring her into the room with him.

Whit's being away. He'd had a fairly good summer. He'd been asked everywhere. That was natural, of course. An unattached man. It wasn't as if he and Whitney were formally engaged. They weren't. Someday they'd get married, of course. Everyone took that for granted. The family, for instance. Uncle Adam, with whom he'd lived up to two years ago. Aunt Claire who was Scott's mother and sort of a washout. Aunt Hester who had brought Whit up because her father and mother had both caught the flu and died within a week of each other in nineteen-eighteen right after the war. That was the family. That was all there was. There wasn't any more. Just Uncle Adam, who was his father's uncle really, and Aunt Claire and Aunt Hester. Aunt Hester was Uncle Adam's sister. She was pretty old. Sixty-five or seventy. It had been rather swell of her to take Whit on like that. Because everyone knew that Whit really wasn't closely related to any of them. A pretence of course. But not the direct line. Like Scott and him.

Scott's father and his had been cousins. And Scott's father had died in the war and his had gone down on the Titanic. But he'd had a tougher break than Scott because cent about it. He'd even been decent about his taking rooms of his own on Charles Street. In return Tod had spent as much time as he could out at the farm this summer. Even though he missed Whit more there than he did in town. Funny, how Scott hadn't seemed to miss her at all. When she was home he never looked at another girl. But when she wasn't he got along all right. Not that Tod blamed him for going around with other girls. He didn't. Only he couldn't see what percentage there was in it for Scott. He honestly couldn't. Olivia Paul, for instance. Scott had been giving her a lot of time recently. She was pretty enough. Beautiful, really, with her narrow, classic face and that fair hair swirled around her head. But not in Whitney's class. A nice kid, without doubt, and lots of money. They said she had one of the biggest fortunes in the Middle West... Tod thought it was Cleveland, or maybe it was Toledo. Anyway, she was visiting Kay Reynolds. And she had smooth clothes and knew how to wear them. Tod had to hand her that. And she certainly had fallen hard for Scott... someone ought to tell her.

Demand "Set-ups" Practice Halted

Indianapolis, Ind., July 27—(UP)—The Indianapolis hotel association today demanded that the alcoholic beverages commission act to halt alleged serving of liquor "set-up" in restaurants and resorts outside of the city limits.

The group charged in a letter signed by Walter B. Smith, association president, that the number of places encouraging such law violations is growing so rapidly as to threaten liquor permissives with being forced out of business.
