Behind the Scenes in HOLLYWOOD

By HARRISON CARROLL

HOLLYWOOD—LIGHTS! CAMERA! ACTION!

Not all those dangerous looking movie scenes are fakes.

In a fire sequence at M-G-M this week, Joan Crawford and Margaret Sullivan gave an exhibition of nerve that proves the Hollywood heroines can really take it.

The scene is for "The Shining Hour." Margaret Sullivan, bent on suicide, has rushed into a burning house and Joan Crawford has followed to rescue her. The camera is now trained on the reception hall of the house. The set is only about 10 feet wide. The two stars will have to do the scene with flames roaring up both walls and with burning fragments falling from above.

These flames come out of gas jets and are regulated. In the scene, however, there is only a narrow lane of safety for the two stars to work. If they lose their heads, fall in either direction, they will be burned before the fire can be put out.

There is real tension on the set as Director Frank Borzage signifies that everything is ready.

Miss Sullivan takes her position prone on the floor. Joan stands behind her.

"All right, light it up," calls Borzage.

Flames hiss from the jets. One column of fire leaps 15 feet high. Others seem to reach out for the stars.

"Action!" cries Borzage.

Joan reaches down and scoops Margaret Sullivan up in her arms. As a feat of strength alone, it is amazing. She picks her up as easily as a man would.

No need to fake the look of fear as she runs the gauntlet of flames to reach safety back of the camera.

Both girls are trembling when she puts Margaret Sullivan down. "Something is burning, I smell it," cries Margaret. Unmindful of the crowd, the two stars grab their skirts, give them a hurried inspection. Their hands fly through their hair to see if a spark has lit there. It is a false alarm. They are all right.

A minute later, looking at the

"SWING" DEBATE IS CARRIED OUT

Audience Joins In As Arguments Wax Hot At Cambridge

Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 7.—(UUP)—Radcliffe College and Massachusetts institute of technology debaters put swing on trial last night—and the jitterbugs won in a lambeth walk.

The debate began as a serious discussion of "resolved: that swing music is detrimental to American culture," but it ended in a five session with 250 freshmen alligators truckin' in the aisles.

The official debaters were Ann Pollak of New York and Margaret Morin of Newton, representing Radcliffe and the negative, and Stanley Backer and Paul Erlanson of Wyoming, O., of M. I. T. the affirmative, but that didn't stop the audience from contributing to the discussion.

Radcliffe approached swing from the academic standpoint, contending:

"Culture is based fundamentally on democracy, and the three attributes of democracy are freedom of speech, originality and informality. Swing is all these, and as a democratic institution, it's a part of culture."

M. I. T. resorted to Webster's definition of swing: "to wield a weapon or to hang or execute."

"Where will our culture be in two years?" demanded M. I. T.

"Truck it down!" the audience responded.

"Swing music is increasing the use of drugs," pressed M. I. T. "Some orchestra leaders among the dope, and that is more, they drink!" Idols of the youth of America take "Give it" someone shouted.

M. I. T. made a final effort. "Swing arouses the sex instinct!" Backer yelled.

The audience clapped. "Two persons of the opposite sex were put in a room together and all day long nothing but symphony music was played," he explained when quiet was restored. "A serious discussion resulted. The next day swing music was played and
