"The ELEVEN OF DIAMONDS"

by BAYNARD H. KENDRICK

CHAPTER XXIV

"A dash of inspection might do you good," Stan told himself. "Fowler frequented gambling houses. You've spent a few hours around them yourself during the past few days. Fowler knew a lot of sports people. You attended a cocktail party with most of them yesterday afternoon. Fowler cultivated Eve Farraday and Millie. How's the brilliant Mr. Rice doing? Not so well, thank you. It never even entered his thick head that Edward Fowler might have been in the same line of business!"

He located the car and drove out Flagler Street, slowing down at the bridge over the Miami River to watch the rain pattering on the water. Convinced that Edward Fowler had been an investigator, or a police officer, killed in the line of duty, Stan was seized with one of his rare moods of depression. It might so easily have been Vincent LeRoy, or Miles Standish Rice. He tightened his grip on the wheel. It was due to the Captain's mature realization of danger that Miles Standish Rice was alive today—certainly not to any precautions taken by his unskilled self!

The apartment house where Stan had taken cocktails the afternoon before looked somber in the rain when he pulled the coupe up before the front door. He sat staring at the entrance, reflecting on how badly wet weather discolored the sharp brightness of houses in Miami. It was a city of contrasting tones of green, red, and white, built to glow in the sunshine, not to be drenched with water.

In the lobby he paused to study name plates on the twelve mail boxes before going upstairs. Four of the apartments showed vacant. He noted the numbers—two, five, six, and twelve, and walked up to the top floor checking their location.

Five and six were on the same floor with Dawson's apartment, but at the back of the house. Stan dismissed them with a shrug. Nobody in either of them could have overheard Farraday's offer of the reward. Number twelve, on the third floor, was directly over Dawson's and looked more promising. Prompted by a feeling of uneasiness, engendered by recent thoughts of Fowler's fate, Stan shifted his gun from armpit holster to side pocket before ringing the bell.

The soft whirr of a buzzer sounded inside. He waited a few seconds and was about to try the door when it was opened by the Negro boy who had served cocktails at Dawson's party. The boy was holding a damp rag, and had evidently been cleaning windows.

"You cum up one fo' too many, boss," he said with a grin, recognizing Stan. "Commandah Dawson lives in numbah eight, but he ain't in. He's gone fishin'."

"He picked a good day."

"Twain't so bad early this mornin'—long 'bout five. He leaves mighty early when he goes. Ain' nuthin' going to stop him gettin' them fish! Nossah!"

Stan sighed, feeling that the boy might have refrained from rubbing it in. He produced a quarter. "You look after this house, don't you?"

"Yessah."

Stan peered over the boy's shoulder into the apartment. "These are nice neat apartments. Is this one for rent?"

"I hardly knows, boss." The boy was genuinely puzzled. "Mistuh Knowles, the agent, tol' me yestiddy that a Mistuh Tol' had took this fo' a month, but I ain' seen him hide of him. I spek you bettah talk to Mistuh Knowles. He's got an office at Fust Avenue and Fust Street."

Stan walked past the boy into the apartment and looked around. There was nothing to indicate a recent occupancy, nor that anyone contemplated moving in. He made a quick tour of the windows, and pushed open a couple of the screens as he had at the Sunset, verifying the fact that the windows of Dawson's apartment were directly below.

In the bedroom he met with better success. Close by the bed on the floor he spotted a few strands of black thread interspersed with tiny spots of red. He pounced on them excitedly, picking them free from the nap of the rug. When he got to his feet, the Negro was watching him round-eyed from the door.

"Is you a policeman, boss?" the boy asked.

"You guessed it, boy," Stan admitted briskly. "And you can get another quarter by letting me in Commander Dawson's apartment." He took his shield from his side pocket and opened the soft leather case to the Negro's awed gaze.

The Negro opened the door with a passkey. For a strenuous hour Stan moved furniture, lifted rugs, and looked behind books and pictures, ornaments and bureau drawers. The Negro stood in one spot, fascinated with the procedure. Finally, when every possible hiding place had been exhausted, Stan wrote an address on a piece of paper and handed it to the boy.

"There's twenty-five dollars coming to you if you call me as soon as anybody enters that apartment upstairs. Understand?"

"I understands mighty quick fo' any such money!"

"Good," said Stan, and returned to the car whistling softly. The threads in his pocket had started a rope for the neck of Fowler's slayer.

After a second of Millie's cocktails Stan threw caution to the winds, or wherever caution is thrown to after a second cocktail, and seated himself beside her on the low divan. He had never suspected a streak of artistry in Millie LaFrance until tasting the chilled nectar of rum and fresh mint which trickled temptingly from her silver shaker.

She had donned a black evening gown, knowing that few men could keep their mind on anything else when her blonde loveliness had the proper setting. She was wary of Stan's invitation, but unwillingly found she was enjoying the novelty of dining with a representative of law and order. He accepted a cigarette from the box she tendered, and she laughed softly at his difficulty in disposing of his long legs.

"It's going to be a change—having dinner with you," she remarked. "I'll rather miss the feeling that my escort may be shot before the evening is over."

Stan grinned. "If it will add to your comfort—LeRoy thinks I'm a second Legs Diamond. Legs carried around a pound and a half of bullets in him, I believe, before the boys finally killed him. Sunday night I was hit on the head and knocked off a boat, and yesterday somebody locked me out on the porch roof of the Sunset and opened fire from the grove in back of the house. Do you want to cancel the date?"

"Maybe I'm not such good company myself," she poured the last of the cocktails from the shaker with a steady hand, but her remark carried a trace of fear.

"Capri!"

She shook her head. "Little Millie knows too much for her health to be good." She gulped her drink. "I think we both better rent a cell on the top floor of the court house. The man who stabbed Fowler and Ben was in this room night before last."

Stan was jarred roughly out of his usual calm. He turned toward her fiercely. "You know this killer and let Eckhardt go to his death!"

"I thought you had more sense," she said flatly. "Ben came up here late Sunday night and slipped in the back door—right past your efficient police guard stationed in front. He had seen you knocked off the Four Leaf Clover and thought you were dead. He said the same man that killed Ed Fowler knocked you off the barge."

"He didn't say who it was?"

"Oh, lord! Don't you think I'd tell you if I knew. I'm walking around in a trance now—scared to go around a corner. Look at this!" She picked up a white evening bag from the floor beside her and opened it before him. Her pearl handled automatic was inside. "I reach for this when a window shade blows in or a board creaks. The man who killed Ben followed him into this room and overheard what was said to me."

"Where were you?"

"In the bedroom." She pointed through the door. "Ben sat on the foot of the bed in the dark. He knew LeRoy's plain clothes man was watching outside. Ben was a fool—a blundering idiot. He saw that man crawling on the porch of the Sunset Saturday night and went back to the club. It was Ben who phoned the police. Wait!"

She went to the head of the backstairs and switched on a light, then walked into the bedroom and looked in both the closets. "I'm jittery," she said as she sat down again. "Ben didn't hear the man follow him in, but I did. I couldn't say anything, but I tried to warn Ben by threatening him with Capri! if he carried out his plans."

"Foolish, insane plans. Ben insisted he was on to something that would put him into the big money. He followed the murderer to the Sunset after you were hurt on the barge. The man took something away from the club—but Ben didn't say what it was—although he said he knew where the man had hid it. Then the man turns the tables on him and follows him here. I think you know the answer."

"That was all Ben told you?"

"Except one thing. I accused Ben of killing Ed. I actually thought he did for a while. He showed me a note he claimed he took from Ed's pocket. I don't remember it word for word—but it warned Ed that it was dangerous for him to leave the club and told him to wait in the poker room in the dark. It was signed with the initials 'D.B.'"

Stan leaned back on the divan and drew a deep breath. "Was it typed or hand written?"

"Typed."

"And that part about the dark? You're certain it told him to wait in the poker room in the dark?"

"Positive. But I don't think Dave Button wrote it. Do you?"

"Why not?" Stan watched her closely.

"It seemed likely a hasty note of warning to me. I don't think a man would hunt up a typewriter to write a hasty note of warning—unless he didn't want his handwriting to show. Dave Button's smart. He certainly wouldn't put his own initials on a note sending Ed to his death."

"You're pretty smart yourself, Millie, but you might have saved Ben's life by telling this to Captain LeRoy yesterday morning. Why didn't you?"

"I guess I was afraid of Ben," she said wearily. "Or maybe I just hate squealers. Then I knew it would get me into a mess. I'd made up my mind to keep my mouth shut this morning—until you tripped me up. I decided after that it would be better to tell you the truth."
