5. According to reports here, about 75 Washington political writers turned out yesterday to greet him in a press conference, which itself is considered evidence of the belief that he is important nationally far more than as Philippine Island commissioner.

One development of McNutt's current trip to Washington provoked excitement here—the former governor's visit to James A. Farley, postmaster-general and Democratic national chairman who has been a political enemy of McNutt's since 1932 and who is reported to have presidential ambitions himself.

McHale refused to comment here on the possibility that his conference might be a public overture on McNutt's part to "bury the hatchet" which was raised after McNutt declined to climb aboard the Roosevelt bandwagon at the outset of the 1932 Democratic convention. But it could be interpreted in no other light, since McNutt on his first day in Washington went almost directly from the White House to the office of his most traditional political opponent.

McHale is definitely pleased over the fact that McNutt apparently will have Indiana's 28 convention votes solidly behind him in next year's convention, and after his resignation as Philippine commissioner will have complete freedom to seek other delegations. In this respect he has had great encouragement.

Currently this cannot be said of Vice-President Garner. Secretary of State Cordell Hull, Secretary of Commerce Harry Hopkins and even Farley himself, who as federal officials must naturally curtail their preliminary presidential preparations, even in their own states.

So the next open step in McNutt's presidential campaign will follow his resignation as Philippine commissioner, expected here to be Sept. 1, after which he will be free to discuss domestic issues. Then the McNutt campaign really will take shape, with the former governor "on his own."

Swanson described himself as a "liberal Democrat." He was regarded as a regular party man, an excellent parliamentarian and a forceful speaker.

Swanson married twice. His first wife, Elizabeth Deane, of Ashland, Va., died shortly after the world war. In 1932 he married Mrs. Cunningham Hall, a socially prominent widow and a sister of his first wife. They have no children.
