—O—O—
An opportunity of a life-time awaits the fat lady who would like a whirling ride on roller skates. The male member of the Whirling Wonders free act issued a call last night for a fat lady to take a merry-go-round ride on the skates. The offer is open all week.

Programs for the fair are available during all active hours of the fair at the Daily Democrat booth, located almost directly in front of the newspaper office. The programs are free and carry a complete list of free acts, parades, livestock showing and exhibiting and other phases of the fair. County Clerk-elect Clyde Troutner is in charge of the booth during active hours of the fair.

Stanley Callow's young son was lost on the midway for a time last night. He was later located through the assistance of the P. A. system. When found he was nonchalantly strolling down the midway, unconscious of the tumult he had caused.

A review of the record in the police and information booth by Charles Zimmerman this morning disclosed that 25 calls were sent over the P. A. system last night after the opening of the fair. Lewis Smith, Argo Sudduth and Elmer Darwacher took their turns at the mike last night.

Mrs. Oscar Lankenau, R. N., in charge of the Red Cross first aid tent on the courthouse lawn, reported treating blisters on heels, a mashed toe, skinned fingers and cut fingers on the opening night of the fair.

A member of the Ten-In-One side-show was taken to the first aid tent last night when he dropped a cannonball used in the act on his foot. The injury was not serious.

Fair officials and police espied a little tyke running down the street, sobbing long and loudly. They found that he was Jackie Conrad and he was lost from his uncle. The uncle was contacted a few minutes later.

Robert E. and Edward Roeder of Lima, Ohio have opened a miniature trap-shoot next to the Nib-lick building on Monroe street. It is reputed to be the first one other than that at the New York World's fair. Special guns are also used.

From reliable sources come the report that Mayor Forrest Elzey demonstrated his prowess with a gun at miniature trap-shooting by getting three "birds" in three attempts.

Roeder & Son, operators of the shoot, vouch for his record.

A number of fair-goers witnessed the accident, in which Dr. G. F.
Eichhorn's horse suffered a fractured leg and had to be destroyed.
Among the most vivid accounts given of the accident is that of Floyd Hunter, special officer of the fair.

"THERE'S ALWAYS TOMORROW"
by May Christie

CHAPTER XVIII
"To what end?" he was thinking ironically. Yes, the probabilities were that she would be included in the haul. No girl as intelligent as she, could be at this club nightly without knowing its true character.

Or was she the unsuspecting tool of Niklas? No, that was impossible.
But the next day he sent her a magnificent spray of white orchids, as though to make amends. His card with a line of apology in French, and his good wishes, lay in the big square box awaiting her arrival at the club.

After a moment's indecision, she had worn the orchids. They curled in waxed beauty under her car.
But before the evening was over, she removed them. It was as though something sinister lurked beneath the flowers.

Now, as she sat in the club eating her dinner, it was not the donor of the orchids she was hating, but Brook Milbank.

"Madame la Marquise, the door-keeper informs me there is a gentleman to see you. Here is his card. I informed him that you can not be disturbed, but he still waits."

Before even glancing at the card, Toni sensed that it was Brook.
"Send him in, Diaz," she said.
"I'll see him."

Best to have it out now.
A somewhat shamed Brook appeared.
"It's awfully decent of you receiving me, Toni. I know I must have made a nuisance of myself last night, though I don't remember the half of it, honest!"

"How did you happen to come here last night?" she demanded. She asked the question, even though she doubted he would tell the truth.
"I've been making the rounds for the past week, ever since I hit the city." He grinned sheepishly. "Had a bit of a smack in the eye out West, you understand. Jessica leaving me so suddenly, and all."

Jessica? Dragging her name in was in atrocious taste. He meant that he had really cared for Jessica?
But, of course, it was her money!
That was what hurt.

"We quarreled. She's mighty hard to get along with, Toni. Not half as sweet as you were. Gosh, I've been a cad!"
Toni remained silent.

"Things were too stirred up in San Francisco, the gossip and all.
So I beat it to New York."
"Just as I did," Toni thought, ironically. "But our manner of meeting our humiliations was somewhat different, that's all. Brook gets drunk, while I wear out shoe leather, job hunting. Now when I've landed something good, he comes here to spoil it! But he shan't! I won't let him!"

Brook was talking again. As Toni watched his pallid face, his near-set eyes that avoided looking directly at her for more than a brief moment at a time, it came to her with complete wonderment how she had ever been so blind as to think she loved this weakling.

"I asked the clerk at my hotel about the liveliest spot in town. You wouldn't blame me, Toni, if you knew what a time I've passed through. Among others he told me of this club, and so last night I dropped in."

"How," she inquired icily, "did you get past the doorman? Only members are admitted."

Some of his old swagger came back to him as he grinned: "Oh, I pushed in with the crowd. There was only one empty table. I headed for it."
She thought ironically: "My table!"

"I was clean bowled over when I spotted you in that fancy rig-out.
You're sure smart, Toni. Don't you think we'd make a good team here in New York? Eh, what?"

"I do not." Color flooded her face.
Had his effrontery no limit?

"Gosh, you look lovely when you're mad. And I like your new blond hair. Your jaunt has improved you, Toni."

Just? Her grief, humiliation, endless search for work, loneliness—a jaunt?

"A penny for your thoughts."
"I was thinking what an astonishing cad you are," Toni answered in a level voice.

"Oh, come, now. I know I acted in a beastly fashion, but I'd been nagged to death about our engagement, for you know my dad has been pretty badly pinched financially, though not so badly as your father. Still and all, I was fond of you, old girl."

"You certainly had a charming way of showing it."
"You don't think I wanted to marry Jessica, do you?"—in an injured tone. "And you can surely understand how I couldn't face you, Toni, to tell you I had to marry her because of our mutual changed finances. You and I couldn't live on sentiment, could we?"

"You mean you were too cowardly to face me? To tell me that money meant so much more to you than"— her lip curled—"what you call love?"

"Don't rub it in, old girl. I'm not as bad as you imagine. You'll understand when I tell you I considered it the correct thing to marry Jessica."

"What on earth do you mean?" This conversation was pure torture to Toni. Yet, even so, she wanted to know the reasons for his jilting her.
"You're not such a child that you don't understand! Come, come.
You've been around."

She half rose from the table, trembling from head to foot. "You dare to tell me that you—Jessica—while you were engaged to be married to me—"

He said quickly, alarmed at her emotion: "Don't take it so hard, Toni. You know—"
"Get out!"

What would have happened between them had not Niklas appeared at that moment, Toni was often to wonder.

It was necessary, of course, to present Brook to the nightclub owner. She thanked Heaven that he was sober, and would have the presence of mind to presume to no old friendship in the past.

"Your premises are charming," Brook said in his most agreeable manner to Niklas, who was bowing sneakily. "I was just saying that I would like to join the club. May I tender my subscription?" Niklas naturally complied. Toni was thankful that he was immediately called away.

But it was disturbing to know that Brook was going to be a member of the club.

What was his motive?—she wondered.

She leaned over the table toward her, and said ingratiatingly: "I'm hoping, Toni, that you're going to let bygones be bygones, that we're going to be good friends. And why not? Aren't we more or less up against it—in the same boat? Believe it or not—I admit I've been a cad—I've a mighty soft spot in my heart for you, and I always shall. Don't you think we'd be a good team?"

A good team? Was this a renewed marriage offer?—she wondered. A sick feeling swept over her—part of the old pain, and a kind of nausea at his effrontery.

She stared at him silently.
"Ladies must live, you know," he said lightly, "and so must unlucky chaps like me who find themselves minus the needful! I was let out of the firm in San Francisco, you see. Jessica's done the fading-out act. My father's lost his money.
Here I am. What are we going to do about it?"

"You mean," said Toni with dry lips, "that gentlemen must live—in the style they've been accustomed to?"
"A bold claim came into his brown flecked eyes.
"A bit crude, aren't you? You wouldn't have said a thing like that three months ago, even though there was some truth to it. Toni, you've—well, hardened."

She said swiftly, vehemently:
"Thank Heaven for that!"
He bit his lip, for the moment suppressed.

Then: "I'm afraid I'm responsible for the change. Am I, Toni? Egad!
If I'd known how things would turn out—the mess they'd be—wild horses wouldn't have dragged me to the altar with that woman."

"Let's leave her name out of this, please."
"I can see where you don't like to hear of it, naturally. Toni, admit she made a play for me!" His childishness was so apparent that the old pain seemed to slip forever from her at that moment. It was as though she were talking with a stranger.

"What with my people's nagging, as I said before, and—"
"Oh, I know I'm no good, but if you knew what I've gone through, you'd forgive me."

A pause.
He changed his tack.
"You're in a far better position than I am, Toni. You've bluffed them beautifully."
"How so?" But she knew what was coming.

"That clever tarradiddle about being a French aristocrat. The marquise line! The whole town's talking about the mysterious beauty. I dropped in at my club to lunch with a friend and he put me wise, too?"

"And did you put him wise, too?"
The extraordinary answer came:
"D'you think I'd cut off my nose to spite my face? That would be a fool stunt, old girl!"

Before she could put two and two together, he continued: "There isn't any reason, is there, why I shouldn't get a cut-in?"
"On what?"
"Blackmail"—she wondered. His cleverness at a price?
