John W. Bosse Will Placed On Record

The will of the late John W. Bosse has been probated and placed on record in the Adams circuit court. The will sets out that the real estate has been transferred by deed to the children, Leona Bosse-

Kohne, Jerome Bosse and Edmond A. Bosse.

It bequeaths all household goods to Jerome Bosse, with fancy dishes and silverware to be divided between Leona Bosse-Kohne, Jerome Bosse and Laura Bosse; all juvenile books to Bobby Kohne and Billy Bosse, share and share alike. The will also provides for the payment of all just debts, for masses to be said for the deceased and his deceased wife and grave markers. Leona Bosse-Kohne is named executrix. Robert Myers is the attorney.

The will of W. Shannon Rhoades, bequeathing all property to his wife, Katie M. Rhoades, was also probated. Vincent Kelley is the attorney.

"THERE'S ALWAYS TOMORROW"

by May Christie

CHAPTER XXXIII
Guy noted the intimate attitude of the couple by the fireplace. Also, that Toni moved sharply back from Brock Milbank.

Rather than annoyance, that suggested embarrassment at being caught, he figured.

There was a flush on her cheeks. A curl or two was disarranged. She came forward, stammering a greeting. "I think you two have met before."

"I should say we have! Often at Harriet's."

Guy gave him a chilly glance. "I'm dining at Harriet's to-night. She's a grand girl. S'pose you're going on there, too, old chap?" Brock said airily.

"I don't think so."

So he was staying here? Dining with Toni? Nice work!

The man was influential. Had oodles of money. Harriet thought highly of him. It would be useful, thought Brock, to cultivate him.

"Nice place Toni's got here! The abbreviation of her name slipped out before he was aware of it. But he'd cover it up by explaining they'd known each other for ages!

"It is attractive," commented Guy, looking around.

"Genuine antiques," Brock rattled off. "It ought to be good. It came down through Antoinette's family. Most of it was in the old chateau on the Loire. I was telling Harriet what a lovely place that is—or, rather, was. You said it, Antoinette, didn't you? Such a frightful pity!"

Toni gave him a look that was intended to silence him.

But Brock, before arriving at the apartment, had been at his club. Numerous Scotch-and-sodas mingled rather dangerously with Toni's cocktail. He was exhilarated, too, at the thought of Christmas dinner at Harriet's.

"Many a time I stayed at the old chateau, when Toni and I were girl and boy."

Seeing the other man unimpressed, he was annoyed. And why did Toni look at him so funnily? He'd say something that would give her reason to wish he'd stay quiet!

"And jolly times we had in San Francisco, didn't we, Toni?" She could not face this.

"If you'll excuse me, I must have a word with Zephine. Mr. Plagge, will you pour yourself a cocktail? Brock, I'll say adieu—with a meaningful glance at the clock.

"Righto. I'll just have another little drink. But I mustn't be late." Toni slipped into the pantry, pulling the door behind her, but leaving it crack ajar, so she might hear what she said.

With a lift of her heart, she heard Guy put a finish to Brock's reminiscences, changing the subject to some question of politics.

In her low shoes, Zephine padded in. "Madame, how you startled me!" The sharp eyes of the maid held a foxy expression.

So two could play at the game of eavesdropping.

She was much too smart to cut off her tongue to spite her face. Report to Niklas that the conduct of his belle marquise was seemly. But, for her own ends, get a complete line on the doings of this girl! And then, make her pay for it!

The rich promoter probably kept her short of actual money, but in such an expensive setting, not forgetting the jewelry, it wouldn't be hard for her mistress to raise cash.

Zephine's astute mind had already assayed a necklace, brooch, ring and bracelet, fashioned of emeralds and diamonds, at several hundred thousand francs. And they were only clever imitations!

Toni went through the kitchen and round to the dining room. The table was completely laid. A silver centerpiece held sprays of feathery mimosa, like sunshine. Tall red candles, set in silver candlesticks, awaited her order for lighting.

It all looked homelike and lovely! Through the iron gates dividing this room from the salon, she heard Brock take his departure. Thank heaven for that!

Toni went into her room to apply fresh powder to her flushed face, and a touch of lipstick.

The evening, she felt, would progress from now on.

Nervous as a schoolgirl with her first sweetheart, she went out to the salon.

Guy was standing with his back to the fire.

She thought: "He's so distinguished looking!" Brock had looked immature and silly beside him.

"May I, too, have a cocktail? It will be my first today. I think I deserve one."

"Of course." He sprang forward and poured one for her. "These are excellent. You must be an experienced mixer."

Was there a shade of accusation in the words?

"In France we do not mix cocktails. What I know, I have learned in America," smiled Toni.

"In San Francisco?"

"Now, why do you say that?"

"Because it was the very last thing I learned about you. You can't blame me for being interested. You lead such a fascinating life."

Again that unrecurrent of hidden meaning.

"A hard life, Mr. Halstead-Flagg."

"Oh, come, come. You have a very good time of it, my dear marquise. How formal they had grown!" thought Toni.

The sort of time of which you obviously disapprove."

"Why make me such an ogre? Each of us is surely entitled to lead his or her own life!"

"That being so," she replied shortly, "perhaps we might sit down on this couch!"

"The couch of gold!" Smiling apologetically, his eyes narrowed.

"Don't you find it rather beautiful?"—as she seated herself, and, glass in hand, leaned back, looking up at him. He seemed miles removed!

"Beautiful—and expensive. La belle marquise surrounded by gold!"

"Why not? It's mine, isn't it? Have you any objection?" She was nettled.

"It is not for me to have any objection, my dear."

"You blame me for loving beauty?" she asked.

"I, too, love beauty. But sometimes to yield to it is folly. I'm only a mere man. I try to be wise."

"You mean, discreet?" she interpreted.

He gave a cryptic smile. His glance swept the great harp, the gilded chairs, sofas and mirrors.

"You love gold, don't you?" She understood the implication. She was furious. "Doesn't everybody?"

"Ah! That depends."

Unconsciously her left hand fingered a gold pendant that hung from a thin chain around her neck.

"That's handsome. And rather oddly designed. Would you mind letting me have a closer look at it?" He bent over Toni.

A moment or two ago, she would have welcomed his nearness. But not now. Quickly she removed pendant and chain.

"Look all you want to," she said ungraciously, handing them to him.

The chain dangling, he held the pendant in his hand.

"Unusually heavy for its size. Might I ask you where you got it?" He peered down at it, turning it over, examining it closely.

"You may ask, assuredly, but I do not have to answer," she said pertly. It was the property of Niklas. He had loaned it to her for a performance.

Zephine stuck her head through the pantry door.
