"KNIGHT ERRANT"

by Jack McDonald

CHAPTER XXVIII

A judge came to the outside railing of the pagoda and motioned Slim to the stand.

"We're ruling Knight Errant off the track for the remainder of the meeting for savaging another horse," the judge told him. Slim stood stunned.

The judge handed Slim a typed statement of the stewards' decision, copies of which were about to be released to the waiting press. Slim read:

"For savaging Comanche during the running of the sixth race today, the further entry of Knight Errant, owned by Miss Heather Mills, will be refused for the balance of the meeting, by order of the stewards."

"No!" Slim protested violently. "You can't do this to Knight Errant! The horse was provoked into it. Judge, this ruling isn't fair!"

Quickly Slim realized he would have to talk and talk fast if Knight Errant was to get his chance to stretch his slim black legs to victory in the big handicap a week hence.

"Judge, did you ever see Coronado run?"

The gray haired official's eyes brightened in memory. He answered proudly:

"See him run! Why, I saw Coronado run all but one of his forty-seven stake races."

"Did you ever see him savage another horse?"

"Coronado? Why he wouldn't do a thing like that. He was a perfect gentleman both on and off the turf."

"It's Coronado's only son you're barring now, judge. I've seen him run all his races. It's the first time he's ever been out of line."

"But will it be the last? That's what I have to think about. What if he does it again in the big race?"

The judge lapsed into a thoughtful silence. Then he shook his head.

"If I let your horse run in the big race the Ashleigh stable is sure to protest," he said.

"Mrs. Ashleigh won't protest, Judge. Edith wants to win the race, sure, but not that way. And I can prove it to your satisfaction."

"How?"

"I'll bring Mrs. Ashleigh up here now."

"All right, get her."

With the feeling he had made headway with the judge, that there was a chance to get the order rescinded, Slim hurriedly sought out Edith. He found her alone in the Ashleigh box.

"Edith, this is an SOS!" he blurted.

"Why, Slim, you're excited. What is it?"

"Trouble? Is it over that 'incident' with Comanche at the wire?"

"Yes, they've barred him from the big race."

"Oh, but that isn't fair, Slim. Edith said instantly."

"Will you tell the presiding judge that?"

So her good sportsmanship carried Edith to the judge's stand with Slim to plead the cause of a rival horse she had every reason to fear.

"I appreciate that you have Comanche's welfare at heart, judge, and mine as well," she said. "But I'm not very proud of the way Comanche acted in the stretch today, and more than that, I hold no resentment against Knight Errant's retaliation. It was provoked, to be sure."

"You show a fine sense of sportsmanship, Mrs. Ashleigh," the judge said.

And addressing Slim, he said: "I'll give Knight Errant one more chance. You run him early next week and we'll see how he behaves. If he tends to his own knitting then, I'll let him run in the Santa Anita."

Slim thanked the judge, thanked Edith, thanked his lucky star for this break.

Knight Errant ran Tuesday. And how! He dusted off a field of six good overnight handicaps, showing no inclination to pick a fight.

After this race the judge gave the horse his clearance papers for the big race.

And to add to Slim's elation, he was handed a wire from Dimples Draper, in Florida. It read:

"Am flying West to hit jackpot with Knight Errant. Arrive afternoon before big race."

It was late in the afternoon the day before the big race that Slim first saw Dimples Draper, walking chestily through the clubhouse. With him was a blazing little blonde.

"Slim," Draper said breezily as he saluted his former boss. "I'll make that horse do a sassy piece of running tomorrow."

The boy's show-off attitude and his hurry to get away with his girl worried Slim. "Draper will have to be watched," he told himself and set out in search of Snapper. They met soon.

"Snapper, I want you to take Draper in tow tonight," Slim ordered. "Get him away from that girl. Take him to your room."

Snapper started off with the best of intentions. He cowed Draper into going home with him, to Snapper's hotel room. And at eight o'clock he ordered the boy to bed.

"How about a little drink first, Snapper?"

"So!" said Snapper, surveying the boy sarcastically. "You want a drink? I'll get you a big one. You wait right here."

Snapper went down to the corner and returned to the room in a moment.

"Milk!" Draper wailed in disgust as Snapper poured two brimming glasses from the ice cold bottle, just out of a delicatessen refrigerator.

"Greatest drink in the world!" Snapper chirped, smacking his lips in pretense. "I drink a couple of quarts of the stuff a day," he lied.

"Come on, Draper, down the hatch."

Snapper gulped down the milk. It was the first drink of milk he could recall having had in years.

And going to bed at eight o'clock! That was another bizarre experience for him. He couldn't recall ever having done that.

They undressed. Snapper turned out the light and a few minutes later was snoring—with one eye open. He had nothing on Draper.

For Draper was doing the same thing.

Convinced, after ten minutes, that the boy was sound asleep, Snapper got up, fumbled into his clothes in the darkness and tiptoed out of the room. He eased the door shut with a crafty quietness and breathed!

"Whew! I've got to have a shot, to wash down the taste of that milk."

And no more had he closed the door behind him than Draper tossed the covers off and was in the act of dressing.

A February crispness in the southern California air stung Heather's cheeks to a delicious glow that matched the deep pink anemone drive as Slim sped her down this artery on the way to Knight Errant's stable early this day of the Santa Anita Handicap.

Clouds which had threatened rain the night before had cleared.

"Even the weather is on our side," Slim enthused. "Knight Errant wants a fast track."

"I don't know how I'll live until post time. Oh, Slim, it will be the biggest moment of my life!" she said, rapturously.

"Oh, Slim, that reminds me. Artichokes is coming down from the farm today. I asked him to bring Coronado's old racing saddle along. It's the one Coronado wore the day he won the Derby and the Hopeful and others! Dan called it his lucky saddle."

"It's only a little thing to ask," Heather pleaded, "but I wish you'd let him have it. Please, can Knight Errant wear it today?"

"What a little sentimentalist you are," Slim laughed. "Sure, we'll use it. We have the winner, Heather. I've never been so certain of anything in my life."

They arrived at the stable and went at once to Knight Errant's stall. While Slim felt the horse's hoofs to make sure the bandages were wrapped tightly, Heather patted the horse's neck gently.

"I'm going to bet a whole lot on you today, honey—twenty dollars!" she murmured.

Knight Errant raised his right front foot as if to say, "Shake pal!" Slim chuckled.

The other Santa Anita Handicap candidates were out on the track taking a final three-eighths mile limbering "breeze," but Slim reasoned Knight Errant was an intelligent horse. Knight Errant would know if he stayed in his stall all morning he was going to race that afternoon. The nervous tension he would work up would put him right on edge, Slim thought.

Snapper Elliott, looking more sleepy eyed than usual, came into the stable.

"Where's Draper?" Slim asked suspiciously.

"Oh, he's all right," Snapper replied lightly.

"I thought you'd bring him to the track with you. I wanted him around early where I could keep an eye on him. Did you go right home with him last night?"

"Uh huh, we hit the hay at 8 o'clock," Snapper assured. "Draper went right to sleep, too. Just before we went to bed we each drank a nice glass of milk."

"You each had a glass of milk?" Slim asked doubtfully.

Snapper held up his right hand on oath. What he neglected to tell Slim was that he had left Draper, supposedly asleep, got into a poker game which did not break up until his room at eight, to find Draper gone. He had assumed the boy had already left for the track.

Post time for the big race was set at 4:40 o'clock. At two Draper had not appeared on the grounds.

But Slim hid his alarm from Heather when a messenger came to him in their box with a note asking him to come to the judges' stand.

Draper had put in an appearance in the jockeys' room.

"You can't ride that boy Draper on Knight Errant," the judge told Slim.

"Why, what's happened now?" Slim asked.

"He reeks with liquor and is in no condition to ride."

"That's strange. I had him under lock and key all last night."

"Come down to the jockey room with me and see for yourself."
