"SELF MADE GIRL" by HAZEL LIVINGSTON
CHAPTER XXXV
Just what she needed. . . To get away. . . Linda remembered saying that to Connie's father, nearly four years ago. What was the matter with her, why was she always running away from something?
In New York it was Deaming, and the mess she'd gotten herself into there, and now it was. . . was it Ned? No, it couldn't be, because she loved him, and she was going to come back and marry him, after she'd had a chance to rest, to find herself again.
"You heard about Ruth Wagner?" Connie asked.
The unaccustomed color rose in Linda's cheeks. "Oh, yes, I heard about it. Glenn wrote."
"I felt dreadfully over it. Such a tragedy."
"Such a. . . what do you MEAN?" "Why her going that way. Linda! I don't believe you do know. We're not talking about the same thing! Ruth had this baby, you know, and she seemed to be getting along wonderfully, and then she died. It was some sort of infection. Of course they did everything and they had all the best specialists."
"I didn't know. When—when was it?"
"Last year, January or February. Glenn McAllister collapsed afterwards, and they had a time with him. They were so devoted. And I think their marriage was so romantic, old childhood sweethearts."
Linda gulped. She was sorry for Ruth, of course. Naturally she was sorry for Ruth. And for Glenn, who had lost his wife. It must be very, very sad, to lose a husband, or a wife. And of course she was very glad to hear that he had been so happy. It had never seemed quite likely that anyone like Glenn could be happy with Ruth Wagner, but—
"Linda, you're white! Oh darling, I shouldn't have told you so suddenly. But I thought of course you knew. It was a great shock to me too, when I heard."
Ned, seated across the room with Harry Emory, rushed to her. "Lynn—what is it? Oh get something for her. Constance—DO something—call a doctor!"
"It's shock," Connie said. "Like a fool, I blurted out something about one of our friends dying, and she hadn't known about it."
"It's nothing," Linda said. "I'm all right."
Ned was rubbing her cold hands. She smiled at him, her eyes full of tears. "But you were right Ned. I'm going to take a vacation. A rest—a long rest. I've got to get away. I've got to go somewhere—and rest."
"She's going home with us. I'm going to see that she takes a real rest. She'll be all right, I know Linda, she's stronger than she looks. She'll be herself in no time!" Constance promised.
But Ned was not cheered. He hardly left her in the few days before their departure. Connie bustled around, taking charge of everything, closing Linda's apartment, having her maid do all the packing, making an invalid of Linda, who was only too glad to lie back and let her.
The last minute Ned said, "Lynn darling, I'm worried. You've been so unlike yourself. It isn't that you've changed your mind—that you have stopped caring for me?"
Linda tried to answer. She said, "I don't know. I haven't changed my mind because I. . . She hid her face in her hands, and couldn't go on."
"You don't care any more, Linda?"

I must know. You must tell me!"
"Oh I don't know—I don't know. Don't ASK me! Let me go home first and see. I've got to go home, and rest. Do you understand? I've got to! I don't know what I want—I'm too tired."
Linda was home in Rosefield—home with Constance. She'd slept all the way across the continent, and she still slept most of the time.
Blanche had driven out with her friend Miss Merton, but Claudine and Bert made up excuses. The Scotts' house still over-awed them. It was lovelier than ever, Linda thought. Everything green and fresh, and blossoming.
"Don't you feel young again?" Constance demanded, laughing. "I can't believe that great big boy out there crawling in his pen belongs to ME! I feel as though you and I were just a couple of children again—until I look at Dad, with his gray hair, and realize that Mother will never come home to us again. It gives you an awfully funny feeling to see your mother married to someone else. I'm glad Dad didn't marry again, though he might have been happier if he had, poor darling. Wish we could see Thelma again, but I'm afraid there isn't a chance any more, and poor Ruth. . . When you're up to a dinner party, Linda, I'm going to try to get Glenn and Everett McAllister over, and it'll be almost like old times."
Linda sat up. The color burned bright in her cheeks. "I'm up to it now."
"Would you really like to see them, honey?"
"Yes—it would be nice. But what's Everett doing around here? I thought he was in France?"
"No, he's been home for a long while. Gave up trying to be an artist. He's working with Glenn now. Glenn has done awfully well. He and Ruth had a lovely home—they bought the old Ramsey place, and remodeled it. He still lives there with the baby—it's a girl, you know, and Mrs. Wagner. Dr. Wagner, dead now, and so I suppose she's glad to have someone of her own."
"I pity Glenn!"
Constance laughed. "Oh, she's mellowed with age, poor old lady, and losing Ruth was a terrible blow. I imagine Glenn hasn't been too easy to get along with either. He took it very hard."
"I suppose he loved her, Linda thought, unhelpfully. She didn't know why the idea depressed her, except that everything did these days. It couldn't be that she had any further interest in him herself. She was engaged to someone else.
And I'm not treating Ned right, either, she thought unhelpfully. I ought to write him, and I shouldn't have told him not to write to me for a while. But she couldn't do anything about it, not now.
She was pale with weariness when she came downstairs the evening of Constance's dinner party. Her blue eyes were deeply shadowed, but the soft blue hostess gown, Paris made, that Connie had forced upon her for the occasion, was subtly flattering, and she'd put on high-heeled scarlet sandals and tucked two red camellias from the garden in her hair.
The two men standing near the window with Constance, turned as she came, trailing her pale blue train, and she was startled to see that Glenn's hair was gray about the temples, that Everett had grown heavy, looked almost middle-aged. Constance was introducing them to Harry, who had come in just before Linda.
"And here's Linda! Linda, I was just telling Harry that we were awfully in love—all one summer. Glenn and I—no, it was Everett and I—and Glenn and Linda!"
Everyone laughed, and for a moment Linda felt the old pain, a knife-thrust in her heart. It might be a laughing matter to the others, it might have been all childish play to them, but it had been real to her. The butler came with cocktails. Mr. Scott came downstairs. A Mr. and Mrs. Villiers arrived. Everyone began to chatter. It wasn't until after dinner that Glenn and Linda had a word together. They had been seated at opposite ends of the table.
"I'm sorry to hear you've been ill, Linda. Constance says she's going to keep you here until you're quite well and strong again. It's good to see you. We never did have enough time together. Something always interfered, just as we were getting to know each other."
The Wagners, Linda thought. That was what interfered. First Mrs. Wagner, then Ruth. Ashamed of her thoughts, she said quickly, "And I didn't know about your trouble, Glenn. I would have written, at least, had I known."
"I know you would have, Linda. I should have written you, but I couldn't think of things for a time. It was such a blow. She had been so well, almost ready to come home from the hospital. I—we."
"We won't talk about it, Glenn!"
"But I want to! I really want to. I want you to see the baby. She'll be 14 months old Saturday. Fourteen months, you see, since Ruth—"
"What did you name the baby?" Linda asked hastily.
"We named her Ellen, for my mother, but I wish now that we had called her Ruth. I wanted to, from the first, but Ruth never liked her own name. Mrs. Wagner is living with me now, taking care of the baby. I don't suppose it's just right—a grandmother, supervising a young child's upbringing, but it's all I can do."
Unless you marry again, Linda thought. She knew that in back of her head, all the time, every minute since she knew of Ruth's death, was the thought of Glenn's marrying again. The thought that she. . .
She looked at him now. A tall, remarkably handsome man. Much handsomer than Ned Hillard, Richard, too.
Why wasn't she thrilled to be with him? Why was she so empty, so drained of emotion, now that the chance had come?
Her eyes met Connie's, who came to them, asking if anyone wanted to have a rubber, father still had to have his bridge.
Linda felt Glenn's unspoken desire to be with her. To go on with the story of his life with Ruth, his child, his work, his future. Perseverely she said, "I'd love to play, wouldn't you Glenn?"
"Thanks, I'd rather not, if you can make up the table without me."
Afterwards Constance said, "Isn't Glenn HEAVY! Of course one has to make allowances, he's still in mourning. But the way he trailed you around—buttonholing you and hanging on to you all the time! I did my best to rescue you, but he KEPT doing it. My goodness, he hardly said a word to anyone else. What did he talk about?"
Linda turned, on her way upstairs, to bed. She was tired, almost unbearably tired. She said, "Oh, he talked about what he's always talked about, I suppose. Himself."
