WITH A WEDDING IN MIND

Red and White Rose Salad Crisp Salted Wafers
Hot Chicken Mousse with Mushroom Sauce
Fresh Battered Peas Tiny Hot Rolls
Tray of Assorted Relishes
Ice Cream in Rose Molds or Fresh Strawberry Ice Cream
Bride's Cake Groom's Cake
Coffee

This menu was planned for a wedding breakfast or supper. But by simply substituting a lovely angel food cake for the wedding cake... it makes a truly elegant early summer luncheon for any occasion.

RED AND WHITE ROSE SALAD

Select small firm tomatoes. Do not peel. Scoop them out slightly and fill centers with a mixture of crisp diced cucumbers and celery blended together with mayonnaise. Press petals of white cream cheese around the outside.

To make the Cream Cheese Petals: Mash a package of white cream cheese (3 oz.) with 1 1/2 tsp. plain cream until of the consistency to spread easily. Fill a dessert size spoon with the cream cheese. Place the spoonful of cheese (point up) against the side of the tomato. Pull down with a quick motion. This dislodges the cheese from the spoon and attaches it to the side of the tomato. A quick turn with the spoon at the end will curve the petals and make them natural looking. Continue adding 4 or more petals, depending on the size of the tomato. Keep very cold until ready to serve. Arrange in lettuce cups, place a dab of yellow mayonnaise in the center of each, and garnish with a spray or two of watercress. Note: The cheese may be tinted yellow if desired. And the petals may be arranged in a double row. (1 3-oz. package of cream cheese makes about 16 petals.)

HOT CHICKEN MOUSSE

Raw breast of a 4 to 5 lb. chicken (about 1 cup) 2 cups soft bread crumbs
Remaining chicken, cooked (about 2 cups) 1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup cream 1/2 tsp. pepper
1 cup milk 1/2 tsp. paprika
10 egg whites

Put raw chicken breast through the fine knife of a food grinder 3 times. Stew remainder of chicken and put the cooked meat through fine knife of food grinder. Heat cream, milk and bread crumbs. Add seasonings and the raw and cooked chicken to bread mixture. Beat to mix well. Fold in stiffly beaten egg whites. Pour into 2 loaf pans, 8 1/2 x 4 1/2 x 2 1/2 inches, which have been lined with buttered paper. Set loaf pans in pan of water, having water reach about 1 inch up on sides. Bake in a moderate oven, 350°, until firm, 1 1/2 hours, covering with paper for the first 45 minutes to prevent browning. Serve immediately with Mushroom Sauce. Garnish with pimiento cut in fancy shapes. This will make 10 to 12 servings.

MUSHROOM SAUCE

1 lb. fresh mushrooms 1/2 cup all-purpose flour
or 4 cups milk
1 can mushrooms (8 oz. size) Salt and pepper
1/2 cup butter

Wash fresh mushrooms, remove stems and peel. Caps do not need to be peeled. Cut stems and caps in pieces. If canned mushrooms are used, drain well and slice thin. Cook gently in butter for 20 minutes. Blend in flour and stir in milk. Cook over hot water in double boiler or direct heat until mixture thickens, stirring constantly. Season to taste.

If you have any specific cooking problems, send a letter requesting information to Betty Crocker in care of this newspaper. You will receive a prompt, personal reply. Please enclose 3 cent stamp to cover postage.

"SPOILED GIRL" by Lucille Marsh Johnson

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Retracing her steps toward the house, Gaby gave a soft whistle for Odd who had been romping all over the place. He bounded in the house when she opened the door.

Laying her flowers on a table on the porch, Gabrielle went to an old cupboard filled with vases, small and large, antique and modern. She chose two and then went in with an old cracked pitcher for water from the kitchen sink.

When she returned she arranged the blossoms. The low crystal bowl was for the breakfast table; the other, a large, heavy pottery one, was for the living room. She did the arranging well from force of habit, but her thoughts were so mutilated that she wasn't aware of what she was doing.

She took the bowl for the breakfast table and went through the kitchen.

"Aren't these nasturtiums the gayest things you ever saw, Violet?" she asked, not waiting for an answer.

"Gabrielle, my dear!" exclaimed Mrs. Snow when she came cautiously through the swing door.

"Glad to see me, Mother?" she asked, setting the crystal bowl of nasturtiums down, and kissing her mother.

"Of course, dear. But—why so early in the morning?"

"Couldn't sleep," replied Gabrielle, truthfully enough. "Wanted some good food, too," she laughed, but sobered immediately when she thought of Peter and the meals he had to eat.

"Well, well, it's nice to have a little girl around again," smiled Sam, coming into the cool, colorful room, grinning good naturedly.

"Not so very little, I'm afraid," smiled Gabrielle, kissing him. "It's awfully nice to be here though." She reached across the table and arranged a nasturtium nervously.

"Well, let's see if any new wells came in last night," said her father, picking up a paper. She had the distinct impression that he was as ill at ease as she.

Violet brought in the chilled peaches and Helen poured amber hued coffee. Sam laid aside his paper and smiled, seemingly at the room in general.

"Now this is nice," he said, placing his napkin over his knees. "Next time I live I'm going to have at least six children so some of them will stay home with me in my old age!"

"Pooh! You aren't old, Daddy! Besides you've told me often enough that one was all you could take care of!"

"Yes; one like you," joked her father, finishing with his fruit. "But had there been more you probably wouldn't have been awfully spoiled, Gaby."

"Really! Is that nice?" Gabrielle laughed, but in her heart this jesting about her being spoiled hurt somehow. She was angry at Peter for going to bed so unceremoniously the previous night, but she was intelligent enough to know she had been in the wrong.

"More coffee, Gabrielle?" asked her mother. "You aren't eating much, dear."

"Half a cup, please, Mother. Gee this is a nice place to breakfast," she added, taking a deep breath.

She glanced at the ivory colored Venetian blinds at the east windows, took in the soft green of the tinted walls, then let her amber eyes rest on her parents affectionately.

"We're glad you like your home," responded her father. "And, don't ever forget, Gaby, that it's always your home no matter how many others you may acquire."

"Thank you, Daddy," she said, blinking her dark lashes swiftly to keep back tears which seemed determined to fall.

"Maybe you'd like to do your old dad a favor," suggested Sam thoughtfully.

"Delighted to, if I can," she answered, smiling mistily.

"I've got to go to Oklahoma City this morning to see about the Snowball—they're nearing sand—and your mother needs the car. How about driving me over?"

"I'd love to, Daddy!"

"Won't be back until evening," he said, stirring sugar in his coffee with unaccustomed vigor. "Sure Peter won't mind?"

"Not at all," she said, stifling a bitter remark which surged to her lips.

"All right then," said Sam, brightening. "Now, Helen, you may have the car the entire day. It's full of gas, too!"

"Thanks to both of you," Helen said sweetly.

They took Odd with them, and Gabrielle took deep draughts of the eyes were wide with wonder. Silently she got back in her car, mechanically stepping on the starter and quietly gliding away.

"Didn't Peter approve?" inquired her father carefully.

"I don't know whether he'd approve, or not, Daddy. He wasn't there!"

"Wasn't there!" echoed Sam, who respected regular hours for all working men above all else.

"Mr. Staley said he had resigned about noon," replied his daughter dully. "Said Peter told him he had to go to New York at once."

"But why?"

"I guess he must have sold his song," she answered, pressing her cool summer air as they drove along at a comparatively swift rate of speed. Heavy dew like that which she had seen the back yard still lay over the pastures. Soon, of course, the hot sun would drink it up. The thought sobered Gabrielle.

Nothing of beauty seemed to last, she felt, with a little hurt in her heart as she remembered Peter, her husband.

Even so, she and her father thoroughly enjoyed the day together.

Gabrielle had always seemed a little closer to her father than to her mother. It wasn't that she loved her mother less, it was simply that she and her father had always seen things eye to eye. They both enjoyed many of the same things, and Gabrielle had been a familiar little figure around her father's oil wells.

Until Helen had decided it wasn't a suitable place for a young lady.

It was after six when they returned to Tecumseh and Sam insisted Gabrielle should go home with him for dinner. She decided she might as well, it would be many hours before Peter would be free to come home.

She was feeling very affectionate and forgiving toward Peter by this time. Determining that there should be no repetition of the past two nights, she told her father that she'd stop by the drugstore for a moment, and inform Peter where she'd be during the evening.

Sam suggested her telephoning but Gabrielle really had an urgent desire to see Peter.

"I'll only be a moment, Daddy," she told him quickly, as she left him parked between two "No Parking" signs in front of Staley's Drugstore.

Much to Sam Snow's surprise, she was back in practically that length of time. A sober, almost distressed look was on her face, and her hazel lips tightly together, and staring straight ahead.

"What song?"

"Oh, Daddy! You know he composes—I told you," she stopped speaking and glanced over at him. He nodded, and so she went on.

"He has a cousin in New York who is in the advertising business and knows a lot of radio and theatrical people. Well—it seems Peter has been sending him his songs for some time and, lately, his cousin has been urging him to come there."

"I see," said Sam slowly.

But Gabrielle knew he didn't see at all. She knew how little he comprehended anything so intangible as song writing. Probably in his mind, she thought wanting to cry, he had a sort of disgust for any man who would waste his time on such things.

She wished bitterly she hadn't gone with her father, or that she had called Peter before she left. Her heart, or she supposed it was her heart, was aching horribly.

If only, she said over and over to herself, she had gone to bed last night instead of sleeping on the divan. If only she had put her arms around Peter in the darkness and told him how sorry she was about the bills. If only—but what was the use.

"Will you wait?" she asked her father when she parked her car in front of the apartment house on Apple Tree street. "Or, will you come up with me?"

"I'll wait," said Sam heavily.

It was as though he knew of the quarrel, she reflected suddenly, as she went up the stairway. She hadn't told him, or her mother either. She wished she had now. She felt in need of sympathy.
