"Flying Blind" by VERA BROWN

Lee had been in love with Judith so long that both she and Tex took that for granted.

CHAPTER ONE
JUST why did I have to quarrel with Tex—today of all days? Judith Aimes kept asking herself the question helplessly. She sat very straight in her seat high up in the press stand, back of the boxes at the Cleveland Airport. And she was glad she was wearing dark glasses, for the tears would come suddenly when Tex's friends stopped to speak to her about his ship.
Now the army was "up." Fifty strong, the boys from Selfridge in their low winged ships wheeled and flashed in the afternoon sun. The roar of their motors synchronized into a deep throat as they began a long dive in formation on the field. Then they were up against the sun again blotted out in a blaze of glory. Just for a moment Judith forgot her own troubles. The huge crowd cheered. They were magnificent!
"Nothing can happen, can it, Judith?" The slender girl sitting beside Tex Aimes' wife caught at her sleeve. There was desperate appeal in Elsie Stone's voice. Judith knew quite well the deep terror that lay in the young wife's eyes. She had seen it in her own. Their husbands were aviators... air racers!
"Of course not," Judith did not look at Elsie as she answered. "I'm so nervous!" Elsie's voice was pitiful.
"So am I."
"You? You aren't ever afraid, Marvin says. He says I've got to be like you."
"No use being afraid," Judith still stared up into the sky where the army boys were doing combat. The roar almost drowned out Elsie's thin voice.
"In another hour and a half it will be all over. Then you and Marvin will be sitting on top of the world. Think how proud you'll be!" Elsie nodded.
"Elsie will win, Marvin says. But if Marvin can place in the money. But suppose—" The wife could not go on.
Judith suddenly hated this other wife, hated her because Judith knew so well what she was feeling.
"The fool. Why can't she stop her silly chatter?" Her rage at Elsie melted in her own sweeping remorse. Why she should have chosen today to quarrel with Tex was beyond her comprehension. His nerves had been at the breaking point. But she couldn't stop. What had she said to him and all that it had driven her wild Judith's hands were icy then in the hot September sun. Why had Tex been like that? Judith stood up. She grinned down at Judith, feasting his eyes on her cool delicate profile. How game she was! What a thoroughbred!
"How about a cup of coffee, Beautiful?"
"I was wondering where you were." Then to Elsie: "If Lee didn't have his cup of coffee with me before a race he swears he wouldn't win."
"I wouldn't. Come along. I've got about twenty minutes before I have to get back to the ship."
Eager to escape from Elsie for a little, Judith stood up. She felt guilty—Elsie looked so forlorn—but she couldn't throw Lee down.
"Please hold our seats. I'll be back in five minutes with some lunch for you."
"That would be nice. I couldn't eat any breakfast."
Lee led the way down the back stairs of the grand stand, through the pressing crowds. They went into the luncheon room which was almost empty, for it was late.
Lee dropped into a chair opposite Judith. "Take off your glasses so I can see you."
Judith obeyed, smiled at Lee as though he were a child. He'd been in love with her so long both she and Tex took that for granted. Lee feasted his eyes on her face. He loved the deep blue of her eyes, the long black lashes, her cool skin, and black hair.
"Over my dead body! If I'd had a glass of beer with you and anything went wrong, I'd never forgive myself."
"Trouble is, I let you boss me." Lee had been watching Judith. There was a shadow in her deep blue eyes.
"Anything wrong?"
"Just the usual."
"We'll all be glad when it's over. Well, here's to the better man, may he win!"
They drank the coffee solemnly. Then Judith determined to ask a question.
"Did you see Tex at the hangar?"
"Yes."
"Everything O. K.?"
"Fine." Lee tried to make his voice sound casual. He watched Judith covertly. Of course she was worried, but he wondered.
"I'd like to have gone over to see him, but you know how Tex hates anybody around on race day." Judith was uneasy. She could read Lee so easily. Suddenly she was desperately afraid.
"There isn't anything wrong with the ship, is there?"
"Of course not. It was purring like a kitten when I left. Lem was nursing it."
"And Tex seemed all right?"
"Never better! You know Tex. Not a nerve in his body! Acted as though he was thinking about taking you out to celebrate."
"I'm such a fool about Tex." Judith's sudden relief hurt her it was so violent.

GERMAN PAPERS
for no reason. The further the demands of the most famous of his people. The victor has been heard. Others decide.

This seemed to summarize German viewpoint. Hitler's speech had implicitly invited him to come to terms and if not, the German war machine would be loosed on the world.

German war planes came their unrelenting attack on shipping and land objectives. Hitler made his speech yesterday—12 new British destroyers and one Hornet. There was no German loss asserted.
