

Alternative to Deportation

Declaring he will kill himself rather than be deported again, Andy Pailo, of Weirton, W. Va., shows his children, Mary Ann, 7, and Andrew Richard, 4, how he intends to commit suicide if immigration authorities do not rescind their order. When Germany invaded Czechoslovakia he fled to this country, was deported, then re-entered, illegally.

The GLASS SLIPPER
by MIGNON G. EBERHART

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

At two o'clock exactly police arrived again and began another round of questioning. They were still there at nine that night when Rue had that unexpected interview with Alicia.

Each witness, that day, had been questioned separately and at length. Rue spent two long hours in the dining room, where a constant bombardment of questions was hurled at her. She was trembling when they let her go at last, unutterably tired, her very knees unsteady, her head and eyes aching. But they had not arrested her. They had only shown her the teacup with her own fingerprints on it; had only demanded over and over again what she knew of poisons, what Julie had known of Crystal's death, why Julie had known Brule, and how long she had planned that marriage. And, again and again, details of Crystal's death. What had Julie told her: had Julie told her anything they hadn't known about Crystal's death?

She didn't tell what Julie had said; didn't say to them: She told me there was something I knew of Crystal's death—but I don't know: Julie was wrong.

If only she knew what Julie had meant and could tell them!

The little man called Funk, who had first come to question her, was present too. He apparently was obsessed with only one thing and that was the green on what he called the "deceased" hands. He kept inquiring, Had the deceased worn gloves? No? Well, had there been any kind of stain—not necessarily green but any color on the hands of the deceased? No? Well, did Mrs. Hatterick know what caused the green on the deceased hands? Oh, Mrs. Hatterick didn't.

The thought of it was as always a little bizarre, a little frightening. They had questioned no one else so long and so persistently. Yet in all that questioning they made only one or two perfunctory inquiries about the powder in the glass: Brule had told them, as he said he was going to do. Could they consider it a ruse to suggest her own innocence?

She encountered Alicia at the door of the small guest room, beside Brule's study.

Alicia was at the door of that study, her lovely hand on the doorknob as if she were just leaving it. She paused and looked at Rue.

Alicia's bright grey eyes flickered once down the length of the narrow hall and toward the empty stairway and back to Rue.

"Wait, Rue," she said. "Have they arrested you?"

"No," said Rue and opened the door to the guest room.

"Look here," said Alicia suddenly. "Why don't you confess and have done with it?"

I can't talk to her, thought Rue, and entered her room. Alicia's white hand shot out, amazingly strong and wiry, and gripped her wrist.

"So you won't reply," she said. "Very well. But understand this. I'm staying here, you know. It's my right to stay here, it's my right," said Alicia slowly. "Because Brule really wanted me to marry him. He asked me to marry him. He only married you because he knew Crystal had been murdered. He knew that sooner or later the truth would come out. He thought if he married you it would divert any possible suspicion from me. Now," she relinquished Rue's wrist and stood looking at her with bright, watchful triumph in her eyes—"so now do you understand just what your place is here? Just how much you can expect in the way of protection from Brule?"

The really dreadful thing about it was that Rue knew Alicia's statement to have elements of truth.

It coincided in the most perfect way with what she knew and with what Andy had told her. It dovetailed completely with her own understanding with Brule; with the whole circumstance of their marriage. It fitted perfectly, even Brule's own admission about Crystal's death.

After a moment she said deliberately:

"Why would you have been suspected—if you had been Brule's wife when Crystal's murder was discovered?"

Alicia blinked, opened her mouth, closed it, opened it again and said: "I don't—Because there would be talk—"

"Do you mean that you knew when she died that it was murder? How did you know?"

Alicia had recovered: her eyes had a hard bright gleam.

"How could we fail to suspect it? You see now," repeated Alicia with cool brutality, "that you can't count on Brule's protection."

Rue said slowly: "Nevertheless I am Brule's wife." She closed the door.

It gave her the last word, and there was a small element of satisfaction in that.

Andy hadn't been right in his surmise that a quarrel with Alicia, regretted too late, had accounted for Brule's marriage to Rue. But in all probability that had been the answer Alicia or Brule himself had given Andy; if it had been a question of Crystal's murder, and Alicia and Brule both hoping to keep it a secret, taking so drastic a step to protect Alicia in case the truth came out, then they would have told Andy (if they had to tell him anything) some such story.

But why was it necessary to protect Alicia?

And why had they been so certain Crystal was murdered?

That night she locked the door. Morning came slowly. Morning and the inquest.

It was, however, extraordinarily brief. Mainly it was a résumé of the circumstances surrounding Julie's death. The most important witness seemed to be Lieutenant Angel, for at the end of his testimony he read a letter.

"Miss Garder's death immediately followed the opening of police inquiry into the death of another person about a year ago," he said. "Whose death?" said the coroner, knowing full well.

"That of Mrs. Crystal Hatterick. The first wife of Doctor Hatterick, who is present."

"What brought about this inquiry?"

"A series of typewritten letters addressed to the police and to the district attorney."

"Do you have those letters?"

"Yes."

"Will you read one and show it to the jury?"

He unfolded a sheet of paper. "This one," he said, "was addressed to the chief of police. It reads as follows: 'This is to call your attention to the death a year ago of Mrs. Brule Hatterick; the writer suggests police inquiry into the circumstances of her death.'"

He folded up the paper, handed it to a clerk who gave it to the jury. Angel looked down his nose. "There were a number of other letters," he added thoughtfully. "Some openly stating that the woman was murdered. We have them all. The one I have read is typical."

"How many were there altogether?"

"About eleven or twelve altogether."

"Do you know who wrote the letters?"

"So far we have been unable to discover the writer."

"And you have undertaken police inquiry into the death of Mrs. Crystal Hatterick?"

"Yes."

"And the results were what?"

"After securing an order for exhumation an autopsy was performed which revealed the presence of a poisonous drug in lethal quantity."

"Your conclusion is that it was a violent death?"

"Yes. Certainly."

"You performed an autopsy also upon the body of Juliet Garder?"

"Yes."

"And the results in that case were what?"

"The presence of a poisonous drug in lethal quantity was also discovered."

"Has the laboratory completed its findings?"

"Not yet; tests to determine the exact analysis of the specimens are in progress."

"But you have definitely determined that there was poison found in both bodies?"

"Yes."

"That is all."

The conclusion was foregone. There were a few questions designed to show that suicide was not a likely theory; this was readily accomplished by the coroner's emphasizing of the fact that Julie's death had almost immediately followed the opening of police inquiry into Crystal's death.

Rue was brought briefly to the stand in this connection.

"Mrs. Hatterick—before your marriage to Doctor Brule Hatterick you were a nurse?"

"Yes."

"You were one of the nurses who took care of the first Mrs. Hatterick during her illness?"

"Yes."

"You were, in fact, with her at the time of her death?"

"Yes."

"Was there anything unusual about her death?"

"No. That is, it was unexpected."

"How was it unexpected?"

Rue, feeling Guy's blue, humid gaze, said it was because they had thought she was better.

"But there were no symptoms of anything but a natural death," she said firmly.

"I see. Is there any possibility, Mrs. Hatterick, that your close friend Juliet Garder, who also nursed Mrs. Crystal Hatterick, had any knowledge of her death that suggested it was murder?"

"No."

"Did you ever tell Miss Garder you thought it was murder?"

"No."

"Why did she come to see you the day she died?"

"I don't know."

"You didn't expect her?"

"No."
