EDWARD WOOD—Even if the fans don't keep over Arthur, the fans liked him, and the Mexican star is playing another romantic role, a bull-fighter, at Paramount this week, and for the same director, Mitchell Leisen.

The picture is "Masquerade in Mexico," and the company is working on a magnificent set, a 17th century monastary, an American millionaire has created into a home.

Rehearsals spent $97,000 on the only reason why they continued it was because plaster isn't necessary material.

Leisen loves luxurious sets.

"Love in the Dark" was his record.

Some of the furnishings will make eyes pop open.

Some of the furnishings are Leisen's own, which he is loaning to the studio.

Leisen is shooting with almost the whole cast in the living room of the mansion. De Cordova, cape in hand, is demonstrating how he fought the bull. A pretty girl is playing the bull.

The audience to the scene includes Eric Knowles, Ann Dvorak and Dorothy Lamour, who are the other three principals.

Leisen is playing this role for comedy, Leisen tells me. "He asked me if I would mind and I said of course not. I thought it was a great idea if he could do it. And he is doing it."

And as to prove the point, Leisen is demonstrating how he fought the bull, doesn't leap backwards into a chair, loses his balance and goes head over heels. It's a tricky maneuver but De Cordova refused to double for it.

Leisen had but one qual about the whole picture.

"I'm playing a bull-fighter," he said. "What do you suppose it will be to me in Mexico?"

Leisen calmed his fears by

Over at Paramount, Olivia De Havilland, Sonny Tufts, Ray Milland and a group of other actors are doing a scene on a railroad station platform for "The Well-Groomed Bride." Sonny and two of the other boys in the uniform and insignia of an outfit that has served in the Aleutians. Also they are wearing the huge mustaches affected by the boys up there.

"Tell him what you did, Olivia," says Director Sidney Lanfield.

"Oh," Olivia tells me, "I made such a fool of myself. I saw two of these boys in the studio street. I didn't realize they were actors. I thought they really were from the Aleutians. I rushed up and introduced myself and told them I'd been up there on a USO tour, and asked them where they were stationed. They finally had to break out laughing and I never felt so foolish in my life!"

De Cordova, during his imitation bull-fight, doesn't leap backwards into a chair, loses his balance and goes head over heels. It's a tricky maneuver but De Cordova refused to double for it.

Leisen had but one qual about the whole picture.

"I'm playing a bull-fighter," he said. "What do you suppose it will be to me in Mexico?"
