

Tight Money Impact On Buyer, Building Firms

Editors Note: The following dispatch gives the arguments against the "tight money" policy.

The American people have been listening for many months to a steady flow of reassurances from Washington that the so-called "tight money" policy has been enforced equitably and impartially for their own best interests, to protect the economy against inflation. It is now time that they ask some searching questions of the money managers who are enforcing that policy.

How effective is the tight money policy? Whom is it protecting? Is it being operated under the traditional American principle of equal treatment for all, or does it discriminate unfairly against one segment of our economy, against one group of our people?

If the aim of the federal government's credit control program is to slow down the demand for and use of credit, I think it can fairly be said that the program has failed.

Let's look at the record. In the field of consumer credit, it is an ironic fact that any American family can take a European vacation on credit but it has difficulty financing a home in today's "tight money" market on a mortgage guaranteed by the United States government.

The heaviest impact of the government's tight money policy has fallen upon the home buyer and the home building industry because they are singularly dependent on credit and consequently are most vulnerable to changes in the credit supply. Indeed, it might justly be said that they alone are bearing the burden of credit restraint, since no other major segment of the American economy shows any signs of cutting back as a result of tight credit.

It should be remembered that much of the home building and home-buying in the United States today operates under fixed interest rates set by the U.S. government. Today, these rates are unattractive to lenders because they offer a lower return than can be obtained from corporate borrowers, who enjoy special tax privileges under our existing laws.

Certainly, if "hard money" is good for the country, home builders as patriotic citizens would be willing to go along. But builders think it would be more justifiable if the hard money policy were the same for all, big and small, for home builders, appliance dealers, automobile manufacturers, steel companies, chemical producers and all the rest of the businesses who make up our complex economy.

Perhaps the most pointed comment on the effectiveness of the "tight money" policy is to be found in official figures prepared by the Department of Commerce and the Securities and Exchange Commission. They show that spending on new plant and equipment for industrial expansion ran at an annual rate of about $25 billion when the Federal Reserve Board first started its "restraint" on credit in 1955 and that it has moved upward in an unbroken line since that time to a rate of nearly $40 billion at the present moment.

And this at a time when American families are being told that it is "inflationary" to borrow money for new homes. Neither home builders nor home buyers are asking for special treatment. But they are convinced that the time has come when there should be a thorough going re-examination of our monetary policies.

Take Applications Now At Twin Pines

Purdue Residence Available To Girls

Adams county girls who may attend Purdue university next year should apply now for residence in Twin Pines co-operative house next fall, advises Mrs. R. C. Hersh, home demonstration council president. Acceptance into the house is comparable to a scholarship or about $250 a year.

Last year, Donna Schieferstein of this county lived at Twin Pines, and several girls in the past have applied for residence from this county. Applications are available at the county extension office and will be accepted until February 12. Any girl in the county is eligible to apply, but all applications must be considered by the county home demonstration council.

Twin Pines is a co-operative house for girls located just off the campus at Purdue University. Sponsored by the Indiana Home Demonstration Association, its purpose is to aid and encourage Indiana girls to attend college and major in home economics.

Eight new applicants from the state will be selected to live at Twin Pines next year. The house accommodates 27 girls and a housemother, with work and expenses shared equally among all the girls. In addition to actual savings, the girls gain experience in home management that serves them after college days are over.

Applications for acceptance into Twin Pines will be judged by the county home demonstration council. The winning application will be submitted to district house committee, which selects three winners and an alternate for consideration by the state house committee. State winners will be announced shortly after the committee meets in March.
