New Remedy for Burns

A "new" treatment for burns is now being recommended by the American Medical Association. Some of the readers may think it isn't so new — they may have tried it themselves.

For burns covering less than 20% of the body area, AMA now recommends immediately placing the burned area, if feasible, in ice water. Nothing could be simpler, or cheaper.

Dr. Alex G. Shulman, who has been pioneering in this radically different treatment, says that he discovered it when he dropped hot grease on a finger. He immediately plunged it into ice water, and held it there awhile. The pain went away, and the burn healed more rapidly than he expected. So he tried the same therapy on his patients.

Dr. Shulman takes tap water, ice cubes, and the disinfectant hexachlorophene, and places the injured part in it. For burns of the head, neck, shoulder, chest, back, etc., where immersion is not practical, he applied towels soaked in ice water.

The cold treatment is continued until it can be stopped without return of pain. The period ranges from 30 minutes to five hours.

Dr. Shulman treated 150 patients this way, most of the burns having been caused by too much heat, but some by electricity or chemicals.

Pain ordinarily lasts 24 hours in first degree burns. But with ice water treatment, relief was immediate, and pain was almost totally absent within two or three hours. No infections resulted. The usual inflammatory process secondary to the burn was reduced, or prevented.

The time between the burn and the treatment is quite important. Speed is essential. The faster that the burned areas can be covered with ice water, the better and more complete the cure.

It has been suggested that this different way of treating burns be included in first-aid books.

Of course, you will still need the old standbys, especially when going places where no ice will be available. And don't forget the hexachlorophene to cut infection.

Melons, particularly cantaloupes and watermelons, continue in abundant supply. Other excellent fresh fruit selections this weekend include grapes, peaches, plums, and apples.

At the dairy counter, eggs appear to be in good supply. Some price increases have been noted in certain areas.
