Home Rule for D. C.

Did you know that residents of the District of Columbia, where our capital is located, do not have the privilege of voting? People who have lived there for generations have lost their right to vote in their home state, but do not have the right to vote in their "home town" — Washington, D. C., because they do not have representation in Congress, nor even on their own "city council"!

The city of Washington is entirely "ruled" by a Congressional committee.

Since 1948, home rule legislation has been passed on five separate occasions, by the U. S. Senate. Such legislation would allow district residents self-government in local matters — to elect their own city council, for instance.

But the House of Representatives has not had the opportunity to approve or disapprove home rule! The machinations of a few of its members have denied the House not only the right to vote on home rule, but even the right to discuss home rule on the floor.

Early in its next session this month, about January 9, the new 88th congress will make the rules under which it chooses to conduct its business.

Since residents of the district have no congressmen, there is no one whom they can approach directly. But if you honestly feel that the legitimate residents of Washington, D. C. deserve an open hearing before the House of Representatives on the problem of self-government, write to Congressman E. Ross Adair, House Office Building, Washington 25, D. C. and ask him to support rule changes which will allow all members of the House to discuss Home Rule, and to support Home Rule for the district if it comes to a vote.

Residents of the District of Columbia have to pay taxes — but have no self-government at all! This is un-American.

You, Your Child And The School

By DAVID NYDICK
UPI Education Specialist

As examination time approaches many high school and college students will be spending long hours preparing for these tests. Although they are consistently advised not to wait till the last minute, this practice continues.

Perhaps, last minute study is not always the result of neglect. Much of this is valuable review. Since most exams require a great deal of specific knowledge, going over facts is quite important.

Effective study techniques vary with individuals. Some prefer long study sessions with relatively long rest periods. Others may desire short study sessions with short breaks for relaxation. Unfortunately, short study sessions with long rest periods are not the answer. Parents should encourage the student to use the method best suited for his needs. Make sure that a quiet, well lighted area in the home is available. The pressure of unrelated responsibilities should be removed. This will permit the student to concentrate in a relaxed atmosphere.

The actual studying should be well organized. Careful planning will save time and produce superior results. A study schedule should be written down, thus making sure that sufficient time is available for each subject. Since such estimates may be inaccurate, extra time should be included. Such a plan needs a few free times for entertainment. Naturally, this will depend upon the number of days or weeks covered by the schedule.

There are many methods and materials available for reviewing. The first step is clarification of the aims and general areas covered by the course. Very often, a course outline has been distributed. A good set of notes taken during lectures is most valuable. A teacher will probably discuss those points which he considers most important. Of course, many of these will be included in an exam. A student should go over the notes, carefully checking items which have been emphasized.

In many cases, students have been given printed material covering specific topics. These should be closely studied. They are obviously considered important by the teacher.

Textbooks are major parts of most courses. Naturally, they should have been read throughout the term. The book should be reviewed to make sure there is an understanding of the major points. A good method is to make notes in an outline form. Items which have been written in a student's own words are easily remembered. This technique can be used throughout the year. The notes will then be available for these important study times. This avoids the need to re-read the entire book.

Commercially prepared review books are available for a variety of high school and college courses. These are not printed for the course as given by an individual teacher. They can be valuable as concise reviews of particular topics. The teacher can usually advise as to their value for his specific course. The materials assigned by the teacher and a student's notes are more directly related to the course.

Study for exams should be well organized. The time spent in planning will pay off in efficiency and results.
