Are Youth Rebellions?

We hear a lot today about the rebellious youth, and how our young people are rejecting society's present values. A wide range of studies, especially here in small-town Indiana, show that this is not true.

The so-called "rebellion" that we hear so much about is mistermed. What youth want to know, and what they argue with their parents over, concerns the time at which adult status privileges should be accorded to teenagers — and the younger set.

Television, which substitutes in many Decatur homes for Grandma as a baby-sitter (Grandma has a job today!) leads the very young to adopt the patterns of older youth.

If parents turn to the "switch" a little earlier — the switch on the TV set so junior can get his lessons, the switch on the car, so junior is home more in the evenings, and the switch on the electric light, so that junior gets the 10 hours that younger children should get — then the desire for adult privileges long before the ability to handle adult privileges has matured will be materially decreased.

After all, if our young people in grade school and junior high see women with makeup, high heels, lipstick, and all the other appendages of the modern native, why wouldn't they desire the same? And with parents earning enough to try to give their children their slightest desire, naturally they encourage them to grow up.

The major problem, according to research, is not the difference in values between youth and their parents, but the difference in family backgrounds between the youth themselves.

Which children are having trouble? The first ones are those whose parents make their children lower class. Yes, I said make their children lower class. Because the lowest paid workers, the family with almost no income, can help themselves and change their values so that their children have a chance.

But all too often the child from a second-class home becomes a second-class student, and finally strays so far from the school as to drop out, because he's "getting nothing out of it." Sometimes he draws children from first-class homes with him — homes where the parents have tried to help their children learn both knowledge and discipline.

And so we as a community are challenged — to change the value of some of our teenagers, and make their stay in school productive. A disgruntled youth makes a dangerous adult — like Lee Harvey Oswald, or worse.

They quarreled after Mounton's son, Glen, was sent home from classes because his hair stuck stiffly out at the sides. The school has a regulation requiring students to have "normal" haircuts.

The school called the haircut "wings." They are forbidden. Glen's father called them "cowlicks." They can't be helped.

"My boy wears a crewcut and his hair was not more than an inch long when he was sent home," the service station operator said. He said the wings were the fault of nature, not adolescent hair fads.

He said he would decide whether to appeal the guilty verdict after hearing sentence passed today.

"Glen's going back to classes," said Mouton. "His hair? No, nothing's been done to his hair. Nothing can
