More About Russia

Recently the editor received a mailing from an agency of the Soviet Union — five copies of books by Nikita Khrushchev. These books were such farces of propaganda that they were almost an insult to reason.

But included with them was a booklist of other books available, at rather modest prices, from the same source. These included a number of historical and scientific as well as political tracts. Just to see what they were like, we ordered a few.

One of the volumes was entitled "Archeology in the U.S.S.R." Now this would seem a rather non-political subject about which Communists and capitalists could converse without hurting each others feelings, we felt. Surely the study of artifacts, broken shards of pottery, and old bones would include no political propaganda.

Being somewhat sophisticated, we thought, all writing about the "other" side would be a little tainted, and we figured that when authors said that Soviet scientific works were "politically oriented" it meant that they had read little innuendoes into otherwise scholarly works.

We couldn't have been more wrong!

At first look the 429-page volume, which was perhaps 30 years behind the U. S. A. in technical preparation (possibly the result of lack of competition in printing attractive books), seemed scholarly enough — the chapter headings were about what one would expect, except for one item — archeology in Russia was divided into pre-1917, and Soviet archeology.

But from that point on, it was quite obviously not written by a Western scientist. The introductory chapter, "What is Archeology?" started out with the usual sly references to "certain foreign scientists" the job that the Soviets were having in restoring historical truth, etc.

Now someone who was completely politically naive might have waded through the introduction without realizing to what he was being subjected, although we cannot help but feel that Russian propaganda is sadly suffering from lack of competition, and that competition with free speech and free press would certainly sharpen it up considerably.

But the real clincher came at the end of the chapter. There, under "List of references for the whole book" were: three books by Karl Marx, including "Das Kapital"; three by Friedrich Engels, and two by Vladimir Ilich Lenin, including "The State".

Not even a Decatur Daily Democrat editorial, when concerned with the subject of archeology, would refer to, say, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry S. Truman, and John F. Kennedy! Politics is politics, but few western archeologists would be impressed by the blatant interference of Soviet doctrine with science; the U. S. S. R. has much to learn in good old-fashioned capitalistic competition — in propaganda, in scientific method, even in printing its finds.

Cattlemen Protest Imports Of Meats

Editors note—The cattle industry is in trouble. Prices cattlemen are getting are so low that in some places farmers can not even make expenses. The cattlemen blame much of their woe on imported meat. The government says that this is only part of the case — that that domestic overproduction is a real cause of the price collapse. The view from the beef capital of Omaha is brought in focus in the following dispatch, first of a two-part series on the subject.

By DONALD R. PIEPER
United Press International
OMAHA, Neb. (UPI)—One sure way to make enemies in the corn and cow belt these days is to defend the importation of foreign meat.

The livestock industry, especially the beef cattle branch, is staggering through a siege of depressed prices so serious that many farmers can't even make expenses on their stock.

And, despite consistent declarations to the contrary by U.S. Department of Agriculture, stockmen claim the "bad guys" in this western saga are the foreign nations which ship meat here.

Choke Off Imports
Sure, the USDA says, there has been an increase lately in the amount of imported meat. But, it adds, the real cause of the current price collapse is domestic overproduction.

Imports, Agriculture Secretary Orville Freeman said recently in a letter to Nebraska Gov. Frank B. Morrison, account directly for only about 15 per cent of the cattle industry's price woes.

The rancher who breeds and gives a start in life to the range cattle and the farmer who force feeds the animals to produce rich and tender beef argue that if there is domestic overproduction, this is all the more reason for choking off imports.

The cattle industry is in a militant mood. Demands have been fired to congressmen, federal agencies and to President Johnson himself that something be done soon about imports.

Higher Tariffs
The farmers want to slay the import dragon with tight restrictions which would cut the flow to a trickle. They want higher tariffs which would make what foreign meat does reach this country compete on a price basis with what the domestic producers have to ask.

Most of the beef being shipped to the United States comes from Australia, with New Zealand another large contributor. Mexico is becoming an increasingly important meat export nation.

But most observers agree that imported meat generally does not have the quality of the domestic product, especially the corned beef, from the heart of the nation.

American grain, especially milo, is being shipped to feedlots in Mexico to help raise the quality of the beef, some of which is excellent.

Despite all their problems, cattle feeders continue to hope for better times. They are paying $5 a hundredweight more for feeder cattle now than fed cattle are bringing. That means the feeder is paying that fed cattle prices will have climbed by the time he puts fat on the steer he buys today.

Stockmen are living off savings and postponing major purchases. This spreads the problems to the merchants in the breadbasket communities where the cash in a farmer's pocket nearly always dictates the health of the economy.
