Nathan Leopold Wins Judgment Of $1.4 Million

CHICAGO (UPI)—Nathan Leopold, the brilliant "thrill killer" who helped commit one of the most sensational crimes of the century, Wednesday won a summary judgement in a $1.4 million invasion of privacy suit.

Judge Thomas E. Kluczynski made the ruling and said the 5-year-old suit would be heard by a jury.

Leopold's damage suit names 57 persons connected with the best selling novel "Compulsion" and the motion picture and stage play based upon the novel. Included were author Meyer Levin, publishers Simon and Schuster and Daryl F. Zanuck Productions.

Levin was one of a number of prominent persons who vigorously supported Leopold's plea for commutation of his prison sentence for his part in the 1924 slaying of Bobby Franks, son of a Chicago millionaire.

Lives In Puerto Rico
Leopold, 59, now is a baldish medical technician self-described as "a fat, middle-aged, thoroughly ordinary man." He has lived in Puerto Rico since his release from prison in 1958.

His $1,405,000 damage suit alleges that the defendants took "the name, likeness and personality of Leopold and conversion of same for their profit and again." The suit charges Levin with fictionalizing family scenes and conversations.

Levin, who currently resides in Israel, supported Leopold's bid for freedom by asking the Illinois Pardon and Parole Board to permit the slayer "who has been a symbol of crime to become a greater symbol of correction." Leopold's case also was supported by poet Carl Sandburg, mystery writer Erle Stanley Gardner, Puerto Rican Gov. Luis unoz Marin and others.

It was in the spring of 1924 when Leopold and his University of Chicago classmate Richard Loeb abducted 14-year-old Bobby Franks, pounded a chisel into his head and demanded $10,000 ransom in a ruthless, reasonless experiment with the "perfect crime."
