THURSDAY, OCTOBER 10.

THE friends of Hon. John W. Kern of Indianapolis are backing him for Congress.

THE Fort Wayne editors are preparing to republish an article in their city and country brothers, when they visit the city, during the centennial.

WE feel disposed to say that Mayor Taggart of Indianapolis, would make an excellent candidate for governor. By consent of the various other candidates for the gubernatorial seat, we will second his nomination.

THE circulated reports last week that Editor McDonald at Ligonier had been shot, turns out to be another correspondent fake. It's too bad that some of these lying correspondents can't get the realities of such a report.

THERE are 627,072 voters in Indiana, according to the enumeration of voters taken by the many township trustees, certified to by the county auditor, and sent in to the auditor of state, from which official this statement now comes. Out of this number 13,332 are colored. The assessment of poll tax shows but 405,573 or an average of 200,000 people who escape poll tax.

THE Indianapolis election Tuesday was decidedly democratic, for all of which we feel highly jubilant and will join the roosters on a good-sized crowd. This election was watched with interest by democrats and republicans alike, the state over. It is a sort of a foretaste of what's coming, and if it continues to come in wagons as they did at Indianapolis, our cup will fail to hold all of the mitigated joy, such an event would bring. However the democrats of Indianapolis deserve congratulation for their vigorous campaign and its results. We hope that they may ever have such a gallant leader as the Hon. Thomas Taggart, the next governor of Indiana.

IN the death of Jesse Niblick, Decatur loses one of its long and time honored citizens. He has been constantly engaged in business in our city for forty-nine years, a period of time that is difficult to calculate, when you consider it entirely devoted to business. He was always a hard working business man; not one of the kind who sits by and allows his employees to do his business for him, but one kind that does more work than any one in his employ, and at the same time always thinking how to expand his business. Such men are few, so it is little wonder that every one should try to imitate him through life, and honor him at all times. Jesse Niblick is dead, but his handiwork will live as long as the world lives.

OUR TAGGART ROOSTER.

Gives 3722 Flops for the Indianapolis Democracy.

There was an election in Indianapolis Tuesday, and that election went democratic. It not only went democratic, but it went democratic by the largest majority ever given any party or any candidate. You know, Indianapolis is the home of General Harrison, the once mislabeled president of these United States. Said Harrison was called upon to use his magnetic influence to save the union—the republican party. But the dose was too much to be taken at regular intervals, so the various outside influences cumulated for naught. The democratic city ticket entire was elected from majorities of 2500 to 3122, the latter being the vote of Mayor Taggart, the greatest of all Indiana democratic political hustlers. To him is due the large majority, he being generally popular and a business man of word and value. But generally speaking it is a triumph over victory for the democrats of Indiana. It is a forerunner of what's coming next year. It is a note of warning to our republican brethren that the ghost is walking, and that they will find no democrats lurking in the traces. That the money panic just passed through was not of democratic origin, but the natural result of a long period of protection to the classes, and taxation to the masses. That the present resumption of business and prosperity is due to democratic tariff regulations, and not because the next congress will be controlled by the republicans. All these things are significant, and sufficient to cause every democrat in the state to rejoice, so turn out the cocks and let's crow.

Indianapolis politically is pretty evenly divided, and neither party has a snap at election time. Never before have the majorities ranged so high as they did Tuesday in favor of the democrats. The past two years of republican rule has been a continual administration of jobbery, extravagance and hypocrisy in general. The people demanded a business administration of affairs, and knew they would get it from Mr. Taggart. His election was no surprise, but the emphatic majorities were unlooked for, and fully demonstrated the fact that a change they wanted badly. The democrats get fifteen out of twenty-one councilmen, so the officialness of our capital city is decidedly democratic. We predict for Mayor-elect Taggart a business and satisfactory administration.

The bank wreckers case of the Coffins, which has been on trial at Indianapolis, is again ended. This time the jury declares Frank A. Coffin guilty, and Percival Coffin not guilty. They were at the head of the Indianapolis Cabinet Company and were charged with getting nearly $400,000 from the Indianapolis National Bank, with the connivance of its president, Theodore P. Haughey, who is now serving a six years sentence in prison. At a former trial both brothers were convicted, but the supreme court reversed the case.

THE Indianapolis Sentinel did some mighty effective work in the recent city campaign, and is deserving of congratulation for it. It stood alone in the fight and in the consequence had much to contend with, but the glory comes later when it sees what effect its paramount war had on Ben Harrison's party.

Criminal Anthropology.

All persons who are of crime are not criminals. There are those who are victims of education or passion, to whom the circumstances and the laws cause that stigma to attach, and by nature, and remote from the types of criminals is a class of people from whom we should not expect to see any more of crime.

There are some who are victims of crime, and some who are victims of crime. There are some who are victims of crime, and some who are victims of crime. There are some who are victims of crime, and some who are victims of crime.

We occasionally see an issue of highly respectable and intellectual parents that seems to be a victim of crime, and some who are victims of crime, and some who are victims of crime.

There is some reason for crime and some cause for crime, and some who are victims of crime, and some who are victims of crime. There is some reason for crime and some cause for crime, and some who are victims of crime, and some who are victims of crime.

It is unnecessary for us to enter extensively into the discussion of heredity and its relation to crime, but suffice it to say, that the hereditary character of certain physical diseases has been universally recognized, and the preceding generation always bring their horrid and pitiable results on the succeeding innocents. The dentist, sometimes in fifteen minutes, learns more of the family history of his patient than the patient knows himself.

Permit me to give a few illustrations. Some years ago there was a well-to-do farmer who reared two children. Both the father and mother of these children were sober and industrious, as the world recognizes these qualities. The son became a lawyer of some note, but before his star had reached its zenith, he developed an inordinate passion for drink. He married a young and I have been informed a healthy girl of estimable qualities and of temperate ancestry. The parental effects of these things, while the father, both having a strong and healthy character, and the father, the son early manifested a desire for drink, became a confirmed inebriate, and met a violent death. Prior to his death, however, he was married and left three heirs at law, all sons, who were born with the characteristics of the father and grandfather.

Another, which has been called to the writer's attention, is that of a youth some ten or eleven years of age, whose father had been addicted not only to the use of intoxicating liquors, but also of opium and chloroform. This child while of a peculiar development, mentally, is a stammerer and stammers while walking on the street like a man under the influence of intoxicants. This child was unquestionably begotten while the male parent was under the influence of intoxicating liquor and opiates, and poisons that had entered his blood were transmitted from parent to child.

The mother of Napoleon Bonaparte, Letitia Ramolina, was, we conclude from biographies, from a semi-civilized people, who, during her pregnancy of Napoleon, took an active part in the wars existing at that period, planning campaigns and actually participating in battles. The results of this participation have caused the world to question whether Napoleon Bonaparte was man, god or demon. The remaining thirteen children never exhibited any of the traits or characteristics of the son Napoleon.

One of the foremost magazines of the times is the writer's authority for the following, which is said by that authority to be from the lips of the man referred to, to a confidential friend: "My mother, who was most impressionable, recoiled from the Calvinistic doctrine taught by my father, who was a minister, and during the parental period of my life, she was a visitor to the home of a relative where she found the writing of Voltaire. She had never read sceptical literature, but her mind was virtually given to doubt. In her then nervous state she books had a fascination for her, and she read them with intense interest. I was born with a poetic nature, and one to which restraint has always been odious, and I have been from the first a pronounced unbeliever in the Divine revelation." The writer of the article also adds that when a cousin of this gifted man told him, some years ago, of her sincere Christian faith, he replied, "I would give my life, my soul, if I could believe as you do, but I cannot."

It is apparent that parental influences had a decided effect upon the career of this man whose writings have done more, perhaps than any other author in the nineteenth century to unsettle the faith of the people in the eternal verities. We are all agreed in saying that certain physical defects united to the certain other physical deficiencies, produce and cause bodily diseases. Then is it not as probable and as reasonable to suppose that psychological weaknesses united to some other mental deficiencies, will produce cerebral diseases? If an individual displays some extraordinary ability in any direction we readily recognize him to be a genius, and so when a man accomplishes some great undertaking we pronounce him a genius. Why may it not then be asserted that it requires a genius to be good? I believe that the man who exhibits some great talent or ability in any one direction, whose parents or ancestors did not show the same strength or characteristics, is only demonstrating the result of parental influences, and I am firmly believe that the youth whose parents appear to be just, upright and above reproach, but who himself exhibits vicious and criminal misdeeds inflicted upon a suffering innocent.

should say "thou shalt not multiply thy species, thou shalt not launch upon the community with which heredity, parental influences and environment have done their worst; thou shalt not bring children into existence whose life is a curse to themselves and a menace to the world."

Those unfortunate beings who inherit moral poisons from their ancestors, and those who receive bodies tainted with constitutional diseases, have no moral, and should have no legal right, to inflict posterity with the effects of their ancestral sins.

There should be a compulsory ideal. The ascent of life is the ascent of ideals. Qualities of life are inevitably reproduced in the offspring. The genius of the Jews for business has been the inevitable of racial inheritance, and every other race, similarly gifted, will be found to be governed very largely by its most prevalent ideas.

We must have a good inheritance; delinquents must be restrained; we must have a congenial environment and the proper use of our functions. If these cannot be obtained by "voluntary" restraint and self-discipline, then the natural law demand enforced civil action. The ideal of a perfect physical nature is perfect health; the ideal of a perfect mental nature is a normal brain; the ideal of a perfect moral nature is a perfect conscience; and the ideal of a perfect being is the blending of these three into one symmetrical whole.

When such a perfect personal equation is attained, when we shall have gained a perfect heritage—a healthy body, a sound mind and a spotless soul; when our environment shall be without foes concealed on every side; when the flower can bloom without deadly foes hidden within its leaves; when it unfolds its beauty; when disease has ceased to be; when truth is no longer crushed to earth to grovel in the slough and mire with deadly enemies—then may we look out on God's universe and confidently expect to see a "perfect" man.
